PRIVY COUNCIL.

APPEAL FROM THE LOWER BURMA CHIEF COURT.

December 18, 1919.

Present :—Lord Shaw, Lord Phillimore, Sir John Edge, Mr. Ameer Ali and Sir Lawrence Jenkins.

S. N. SEN AND ANOTHER—PLAINTIFFS—APPELLANTS

THE BANK OF BENGAL—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Guarantee, contract of—Guarantee for faithful performance of duties by khazanchee of Bank—Fraud by khazanchee*—Liability of guarantor.*

E., an Asiatic resident in Burma, was appointed khazanchee of the Bank of Bengal at Rangoon, and for the due and faithful performance of the duties of his office his father G. deposited certain securities with the Bank upon the terms of a tripartite agreement to which the father, the son and the Bank were parties. One of the duties of the khazanchee under the agreement was to inquire into and ascertain and report upon the credit, solvency and circumstances of Asiatic residents in Burma having dealings with the Bank through his agency, and in the course of his employment E was also a customer of the Bank and was largely indebted to it It was found that his dealings with the Bank had been fraudulent and that he had concealed these frauds from the Bank, though as an official he was bound to report upon the frauds of a customer. He ceased to be khazanchee of the Bank, and shortly after was adjudicated insolvent and an Official Receiver was appointed. The father died while E was still in the service of the Bank. The Official Receiver brought the present suit to recover from the Bank the securities which the father had deposited for the son's faithful discharge of his duties as khazanchee, on the ground that accounts between the Bank and E. as khazanchee having been settled nothing was due thereon, and that it was immaterial that money was due by E in his capacity as a customer:

Held, that the suit must fail, the transaction between the father and the Bank was one of guarantee and so long as E. continued in the appointment of khazanchee, the guarantee remained and was not revoked by the death of the guarantor, that there was misfeasance by E. within the terms of his agreement and by reason of such misfeasance there was a loss incurred by the Bank to the full extent of the security. [p. 3, col 1; p 6, col. 1.]

Appeal from the judgment of Ormond, Officiating Chief Judge, and Parlett, J., Lower Burma, dated the 11th June 1917 and reported as 42 Ind. Cas. 900, reversing a judgment and decree of the Court in its Original Civil Jurisdiction (Young, J.), dated the 26th January 1915.

Mr. De Gruyther, K. C., and Mr. Eddis, for the Appellants.

Sir Erle Richards, K. C., and Mr. W. Draper, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

LORD PHILLIMORE.—One Gnanamutu Stephen was khazanchee at the Rangoon branch of the Bank of Bengal, which Bank is the defendant in the suit and respondent in the present appeal.

Gnanamutu Stephen was also a moneylender carrying on business on his own account He ceased to be khazanchee on the 27th January 1903, on which event his son Edward was appointed in his stead.

The Bank required Edward to find security, and this security was found by his father for him upon the terms of a tripartite agreement dated the 5th February 1903, to which the father, the son and the Bank were parties.

On the 1st December 1907 the father took his son Edward and another son, Andrew, into partnership, and the three traded for a short time under the name of G. Stephen and Sons. This did not last long, and the father died on the 27th January 1908 leaving a Will by which, subject to certain provisions for his wife and certain legacies, the residue of his property was bequeathed to his two sons in equal shares.

David Rajh was one of the executors named in the Will, and Probate was granted to him. He is the second plaintiff in the suit, and the second appellant before the Board.

S. N. SEN v. BANK OF BENGAL.

After the death of the father the partnership was continued between the sons, and an indenture of partnership was executed between them on the 27th April 1908; but Andrew Stephen, on the 1st June, exercised the power given to him by the partnership indenture of giving three months' notice to retire from the partnership, and did so on the 1st September. In March 1909 Edward tendered to the Bank his resignation of the office, and ceased to be khazanchee on the 18th June 1909. On the 1st March 1910, he was adjudicated insolvent, and S. N. Sen, an Official Receiver, is now the respresentative of his estate. Sen is the first plaintiff and the first appellant.

When the accounts between the Bank and Edward Stephen in his capacity of a customer came to be settled, he was found to be largely indebted to the Bank. The figure as ultimately worked out is Rs. 1,84,548. The appellants, however, contend that this figure is wiped out because the Bank hold certain promissory notes to the value of Rs. 1,95,000.

On the 3rd February 1913 this action was brought for the purpose of recovering from the Bank the security which the father had lodged for the son's faithful discharge of his duties as khazanchee, security, which being at the beginning of the value of Rs. 75,000, had been augmented by interest to Rs. 82,437. The case put forward by the plaintiffs was that all accounts between Edward in his capacity of khazanchee and the Bank had been long since settled, that nothing was due from him in that capacity, that it was immaterial to a claim by the father's representative that money was due from Edward in his capacity as a customer, and that even if that were to be inquired into, the block of securities held by the Bank was more than enough to wipe out the debt. The logical consequence of this would be that Rajh, as representing the father's estate, would be entitled to recover the securities which the father had deposited.

Sen's interest was a derivative one only as representing the son's share as legatee under his father's Will, and he seems to have been an unnecessary party. However, no objection was taken. No doubt ultimately, success by the father's executor would inure to the benefit of the creditors of the legatee son, and it is not without some importance, in view of what happened, that Sen and Rajh should be found thus acting together.

The position taken by the Bank was that Edward in his capacity as khazanchee had not been faithful, and that he had committed distinct breaches of the agreement of security by being fraudulent as a customer, and concealing these frauds from the Bank though he was as an official bound to report upon the frauds of a customer or upon anything likely to affect the solvency of a customer, and that, therefore, the loss which the Bank had sustained by reason of his account being in debit was properly attributable to his misconduct as khazanchee. The Bank further said that, for reasons to be hereinafter mentioned, the block of securities, though of the apparent nominal value of Rs. 1,95,000, either was of no value or was not such as the Bank was bound to realise, while it had, in fact, transferred the block for what it was worth to Sen acting on behalf of himself and Rajh.

Part of the security deposited was a sum of Rs. 25,000 cash. During the course of the proceedings, and by arrangement, the other effects were realised, and it was agreed that the total sum thereby obtained amounted to Rs. 82,437.

When the case came on trial in the Chief Court of Lower Burmah, Young, J., decided in favour of the plaintiffs, being of opinion that the Bank was not entitled to retain the security, and ordered it to re-pay to the plaintiffs the sum of Rs. 82,347 with costs.

On appeal, the Court, in its appellate jurisdiction, consisting of Ormond, O. C. J., and Parlett, J.,* reversed this decision and dismissed the suit with costs in both Courts, hence the present appeal.

The first point made on behalf of the appellants was that the instrument of security was a continuing guarantee within the meaning of the Indian Contract Act, section 129, and as such was revoked by the death of the surety according to section 131.

It is to be gathered from the terms of the agreement of the 5th February 1903 that the natural person to deposit security was Edward Stephen, the new khazanchee, and that by special arrangement the father was let in to deposit security in lieu of the son. There is no binding of the father in the agreement, but merely a pleading of the deposited security. In these circumstances it might be questioned whether there was any contract of guarantee within the meaning of section 124 of the same Act. But this view does not appear to have been presented to the Courts in India, and their Lordships find it unnecessary to express an opinion upon it.

Both Courts treating the transaction as one of guarantee held that it was not a continuing guarantee, and their Lordships think rightly.

The words of the section are "A guarantee which extends to a series of transactions is called a continuing guarantee." There was no series of transactions here. It was one transaction, the appointment of Edward Stephen to a place of trust in the Bank. So long as he continued in that place, the guarantee remained and would not be revoked by the death of the guarantor. Any other view would have consequences very injurious to business. It would put the Bank in the position of having either to get rid of an official forthwith upon the death of his guarantor, which might be most inconvenient, or to keep him without security for his good behaviour. Moreover, as the Judges in the Appeal Court observe, Edward Stephen was entitled to three months' notice, and the Bank could not get rid of him forthwith, and must take a risk for three months if the guarantee was revoked by the father's death.

Their Lordships deem it unnecessary to elaborate the argument on this point.

This point being disposed of, two other questions arise for their Lordships' determination; whether the loss, if any, which the Bank has sustained by reason of the debit on Edward Stephen's account as a customer can be attributed to some misfeasance on the part of Edward Stephen as khazanchee, that is some misfeasance falling within the terms of the instrument of security; and secondly, whether having regard to the block of securities already mentioned as at one time in the possession of the Bank, it is to be held that there is a true debit balance on the account of Edward Stephen as a customer which the Bank cannot, or is not bound to, wipe out by the realisation of this block of securities.

It is now necessary to turn to the terms of the instrument of security. As already stated, it is a tripartite agreement, and it begins with the following recitals:—

"Whereas the said Edward Dawson Stephen (hereinafter called the khazanchee) has been appointed to and now holds the office of khazanchee for the Rangoon branch of the Bank, and upon the said appointment being made it was agreed that he should furnish security to the Bank to the extent of Rs. 75,000 for the due and faithful performance of the duties of his office. And whereas the said Gnanamathu Stephen has at the request of the khazanchee and with the concurrence of the Bank agreed to furnish the said security for the khazanchee in the manner hereinafter stated; namely, by depositing with the Bank the sum of Rs. 25,000 in cash, bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, payable at the Bank of Bengal, Rangoon, half-yearly, and a demand promissory note, dated the 1st October 1902, for Rs. 25,000, signed by S. N. Ramanathen Chetty and V. V. R. Chookalingum Chetty jointly and severally, in favour of the said Gnanamuthu Stephen, and by him endorsed to the Bank, the said demand promissory note to be a continuing security for so long as the khazanchee shall be liable under this agreement to the Bank and by the mortgage hereinafter recited to the Bank to secure the further sum of Rs. 25,000 And whereas in part performance of the said agreement the said Gnanamathu Stephen has deposited with the Bank the said sum of Rs. 25,000 and also the said promissory note, particulars whereof are specified in the first schedule hereto. And whereas by an indenture bearing or intended to bear even date with these presents and made between the said Gnanamathu Stephen of the first part, the khazanchee of the second part and the Bank of the third part, all that dwelling-house and premises known as No. 11, Mission Road, Rangoon, more particularly specified in the second schedule hereto are in further pursuance of the said agreement mortgaged and charged to the Bank as security to the extent of the further sum of Rs. 25,000, for the due and faithful performance by the khasanchee of the duties of his said office. And whereas these presents are entered into for the purpose of defining generally the duties, liabilities and responsibilities of the said office of khazanchee."

The material clauses of the agreement are the following :—

"1. That the khazanchee shall be and continue the kahzanchee of the Rangoon branch of the Bank from the date of these presents at a monthly salary of Rs. 350 only such service being determinable on either side by three calender months' notice to that effect.

"2. That the duties, liabilities and responsibilities devolving upon the khazanchee as such khazanchee as aforesaid, shall be such as either by custom or contract usually devolve upon a khazanchee in the employ of the Bank including the duties, liabilities and responsibilities hereinafter mentioned.

"5. That the khazanchee shall enquire into and as far as possible ascertain and, if required to do so, truly and faithfully report in writing upon the identity, credit, solvency and circumstances of all persons being Asiatic residents in India or Burma, who shall after the date hereof have dealings of any kind with the Bank through the Agency of the khazanchee in the course of his employment as khazanchee, and shall make good to the Bank all losses and expenses by reason of any carelessness, or default or misrepresentation in any such enquiry or report made by the khazanchee during the course of his employment as khazanchee.

"8. That the said cash deposit and promissory note so deposited as aforesaid shall remain in the hands of the Secretary and Treasurer for the time being of the Bank as security for the faithful discharge by the khazanchee of the duties of his office, and also for the protection and security of the Bank, their successors or assigns against any such damages, losses, costs, charges and expenses as are hereinbefore set forth, and that the said securities shall not be claimed by or returned to the said Gnanamathu Stephen until all accounts between the khazanchee and the Bank, their successors or assigns have been finally closed and settled, and all balances, if any, due by the khazanchee shall have been paid and discharged.

"9. Until any such loss or damage shall happen, interest on the said cash deposit of Rs. 25,000 at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum shall be paid by the Bank. . . ."

It is admitted that the firm of which Edward Stephen was either a partner or sole member comes within the description of Asiatic residents in Burma.

The account of Edward Stephen being generally overdrawn he was expected to furnish, and did furnish, security which varied from time to time. This security generally took the form of promissory notes by Chetties engaged in financial transactions. These notes were indorsed and handed to the Bank. From time to time the makers would pay off the notes, and then Edward Stephen would fetch them away from the Bank and deposit, if the state of the account required it, some other promissory notes as security. Apparently he was to this extent trusted by the makers that they would pay him the money without requiring the immediate production of the notes, and would leave it to Stephen to hand them back later.

The block of securities to which reference has been made consisted of six notes for large sums, three made in 1907 and three in 1908. At different dates in 1908 and 1909, all while Edward Stephen was khazanchee, the sum due on these notes was paid, in some cases by one payment, in some by instalments, to Edward Stephen by the makers. Edward Stephen did not inform the makers that the notes had been indorsed over, and were in the possession of the Bank so that he could not give a good discharge without getting them from the Bank; he did not inform the Bank that they had been paid; and, though the sums paid by the makers found their way to Edward Stephen's account with the Bank, and to that extent reduced his debit balance, the manager of the Bank was left in the belief that he still had these notes as good security, and consequently allowed from time to time larger overdrafts than he otherwise would have done. It was due to this circumstance that Edward Stephen was allowed to overdraw to so large an extent, and to be upon the final winding-up so heavily indebted.

That these transactions were frauds upon the makers of the promissory notes there can be no question, nor can it, in their Lordships' opinion, be doubted that they were frauds upon the Bank. It is true that the notes being negotiable instruments, and having been transferred to the Bank for value, payment to Edward Stephen did not operate as a discharge to the several makers, and that the Bank as holders in due course might possibly still sue upon them and compel the makers to pay over again. But in the first place the Bank was entitled to hold these documents as unquestionable securities, and not securities which would almost necessarily involve litigation if they were to be realised. Secondly, the Bank was entitled not to be put into the odious position which such litigation would put it in, a position extremely likely to injure its popularity and its custom, and thirdly, inasmuch as Edward Stephen filled a dual capacity it would be quite possible that a plausible case might be set up by each maker to the effect that he must be deemed to have paid to Edward Stephen in the capacity of an officer of the Bank; that the Bank had, in fact, through Edward, got the money, and, therefore, that it was inequitable to sue him to recover it over again.

Thus while to the belief of the Bank manager the paper remained as good a security as it was at the first, its value had at least seriously diminished: it was no longer an absolute, but at the best a questionale security.

Now was this fraud committed by Edward as a customer, and not revealed nor provided against by Edward as khazanchee, one of those acts or defaults for which the security deposited by his father could be made responsible?

Clause 2 of the agreement defines the duties of a khazanchee as those which either by custom or contract usually devolve upon such an officer including, but not confined to, the duties, liabilities and responsibilities afterwards set out in detail. That an officer of the Bank who has heard some rumour that a customer is or may be doing something fraudulent may be absolved from communicating his information to his superior is quite possible. This argument was forcibly brought before their Lordships by Counsel for the appellants. But when it is no longer a question of rumour or probability, but the officer knows, and as he was himself the fraudulent person he knew, and when the fraud was of the kind which it was, it seems pretty plain that it would be a breach of duty not to communicate it.

If evidence were wanted to prove that this was one of the duties which by custom or contract would devolve upon a khazanchee the evidence of Mr. William Mackintosh, acting Agent of the Bank of Bengal, evidence unchallenged by cross examination and uncontradicted, would be sufficient to prove this.

But the Bank also relies upon clause 5 which makes it the duty of the khazanchee to enquire into and, so far as possible, ascertain the credit, solvency and circumstances of Asiatic residents who have dealings with the Bank through his agency and in the course of his employment.

It is true that in the same clause occurs the phrase that he is to report in writing when required, and that he was not required. But if it is his duty to enquire and ascertain and the result of the ascertainment is such as would lead the manager of the Bank to close the customer's account, there needs no requirement to make a report necessary; the ascertainment would be idle if it was not followed by the proper result, that is a report.

In their Lordships' opinion the Court of Appeal put the right construction upon these clauses, and, therefore, the effects deposited as security for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office and for the protection and security of the Bank against such losses as are set forth in the instrument may be retained by the Bank until all such losses have been discharged.

There remains the question whether the Bank has sustained any loss, in other words, whether the Bank was bound to realise the promissory notes, obtain payment of them over again, and apply the sums received to wipe out the debit balance. As to this it appears that the Bank did make application to each of the makers, and received for answer in each case that the makers had, as in fact they had, paid the money to Edward Stephen in the belief that he was the holder of the notes.

Afterwards, and during the course of much discussion and correspondence, the Bank as already stated passed the notes to Sen. It may well be that in his hands they were valueless because he represents Edward, but if there were any value to be got out of them at all it could be just as well got by his co-plaintiff, Rajh, as by the Bank.

In their Lordships' opinion the Bank was not bound to sue these makers and compel them to pay over again. It may be doubted whether, in any event, the Bank would be bound to sue upon the notes, but in the particular circumstances it would put an intolerable burden upon the Bank.

The Bank was probably bound (if so required) to hand the notes over to the father's representative, so that he might make what he could out of them, at any rate to the extent of the value of the security which he had deposited. But in substance that is what was done when the notes were transferred to Sen. If the Bank either could not realise or was not bound to realise the notes, the debit balance remains; and it is larger than the total amount of the security deposited. There was, therefore, misfeasance by the khazanchee within the terms of the agreement, and by reason of such misfeasance there was a loss incurred by the Bank to the full extent of the security.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Provincial Insolvency Act (III of 1907), s. 22—Official Receiver, conduct of, by whom to be brought to notice of Court—Inherent power of Court to rectify errors.

The conduct of an Official Receiver in any particular respect may be brought to the notice of the Court by any person with a view to having the Receiver's act or decision in any particular matter reversed or modified, it is not merely the insolvent or the creditors or any aggrieved person who can take action in this respect [p 7, col. 1.]

A Court has inherent power to rectify the errors or mistakes of a Receiver or to reverse or modify his acts or decisions, and in such a case the time limit prescribed by section 22 of the Provincial Insolvency Act would be no bar to action being taken by the Court. [p. 7, cols. 1 & 2.]

Miscellaneous first appeal from the order of the District Judge, Karnal, dated the 11th March 1919.

Mr. Shamair Chand, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Nand Lal and Manohar Lal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In the course of certain insolvency proceedings the Receiver appointed by the Court sold, by public auction, the insolvent's equity of redemption in respect of certain agricultural land in the Gurgaon District. The sale took place on the 20th September 1918 and the highest bidder was the present appellant, Data Ram, whose bid of Rs. 3,200 was accepted by the Receiver. Subsequently a sale-deed in favour of Data Ram was duly executed and registered by the Receiver, but on the 18th and 19th of October 1918 the mortgagees of the property and two persons named Karori Mal and Hargopal respectively filed applications in the Court of the District Judge, alleging that there had been irregularities in connection with the sale proclamations and the conduct of the sale and that a fair price had not been obtained for the property in consequence. The Receiver was called upon to make a report, and on the 4th December 1918 he submitted the required report explaining the circumstances and pointing out that the objections to the sale were time-barred under section 22 of the Provincial Insolvency Act of 1907 and that the sale was good and valid. The District Judge, however, on the 11th March came to the conclusion that the sale was not properly advertised and that the price obtained was not the highest which the land could fetch. He accordingly directed that a date should be fixed for an auction to take place in his Court at Karnal, and added that if at the subsequent sale no higher bid than that already made by Data Ram was received, the sale in the latter's favour would be sanctioned; otherwise sanction would be given to a sale in favour of the highest bidder. Data Ram has appealed from this order and his appeal was filed in this Court on the 1st May 1918. In the meantime the second auction was duly held on the 16th April 1919 and a sale effected for Rs. 7,600 in favour of Tota Ram. The second sale was confirmed by order dated the 1st May 1919, the same day on which the present appeal was filed in this Court.

The grounds urged on behalf of the appellant are—

(1) that the objections to the sale in his favour were time-barred under the provisions of section 22 of the Provincial Insolvency Act;

(2) that the objectors had no locus standi under section 22 of the Act, inasmuch as (a) Karori Mal had sold his decree on 8th March 1916 to Banwari Lal who, by order dated the 2nd May 1917, was entered on the list of creditors in his place, and (b) Hargopal, the other objector, merely signed the application to the District Judge but took no further part in supporting it in Court. In this connection it is pointed out that the Pleader who filed the application expressly purported to act on behalf of Karori Mal only; and

(3) that there were no irregularties in the sale proceedings and that consequently no one suffered substantial injury by reason of such irregularities.

As regards the first two grounds of appeal, which can be dealt with together, I have been referred by Mr. Nand Lal on behalf of the respondents to a case decided by a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court and reported as Hanseswar Ghosh v. Rakhal Das Ghose (1). This case seems to me to be exactly in point and good authority for the proposition that it is not merely the insolvent or the creditors or any other aggrieved person who can take action to bring the conduct of a Receiver in any particular respect to the notice of the Court with a view to having the Receiver's act or decision in any particular matter reversed or modified. The Receiver is an officer of the Court, and when it comes to the knowledge of the Court that his action in any particular respect is open to objection, the Court must have inherent powers to rectify the Receiver's errors or mistakes, or to reverse or modify his acts or decisions. From this point of view it would be immaterial if the Court acted upon information supplied by persons who were outside the scope of section 22 of the Act; and in such a case the time limit prescribed by section 22 would be no bar to action being taken by the Court. The question then is whether upon the merits the Court was justified in setting aside the sale in favour of Data Ram. Regarding this point the District Judge states that the sale was not properly advertised and that in consequence the price obtained was not the highest which the land could fetch. There is nothing on the record to show that a copy of the proclamation of sale was set up at the Court's house at Karnal, and the allegation that the Receiver took no proper steps to proclaim the sale is supported by the fact that at the second sale no smaller a bid than Rs. 7,600 was obtained whereas on the first occasion the property was knocked down to Data Ram for Rs. 3,200. Obviously substantial injury resulted to the judgment-debtor and this injury was, I think, due to the fact that the Receiver took no proper steps to advertise the first auction.

Taking all the facts into consideration, I am of opinion that the District Judge acted reasonably and in the interests of the insolvent and the creditors in setting aside the first sale. I accordingly dismiss this appeal with costs.

larly—Mortgagee apportioning payments towards principal and interest—Waiver, acceptance of instalments, whether amounts to.

A mortgage-deed provided for the payment of the mortgage-debt by nine half yearly instalments without interest, but in case of default it was agreed that the mortgagee would be at liberty to cancel the arrangement as to instalments and could sue for the whole amount and charge interest at a stipulated rate Default was made in the payment of the first instalment, which was paid too late. The mortgagee credited part of the payment towards interest which had begun to run and the balance towards reduction of the principal. Various other sums were paid and were apportioned in the same way. Eventually, the mortgagee brought the present suit to recover the unpaid debt plus interest:

Held, that the mortgagee was entitled to sue for interest and that the acceptance by him of payments of principal and interest due under the mortgage-deed did not constitute a waiver of his right to charge interest. [p. 9, cols, 1 & 2; p. 10, col. 1.]

Second appeal from a decree of the District Judge, Budaun.

Messrs. Iqbal Ahmad and Mukhtar Ahmad, for the Appellants.

Mr. Ibn Ahmad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The facts out of which this appeal arises must be carefully noted. The mortgagor (defendant-appellant No. 1) borrowed a sum of Rs. 99 under a mortgage of his Zamindari property, dated the 14th September 1897. The rate of interest agreed upon was two per cent. per mensem. He paid nothing at all either towards principal or interst, so that in 1904 the debt had swelled to Rs. 450. The mortgagee then threatened to sue to recover this amount, but was persuaded by the mortgagor to give him time and renew the mortgage. Thereupon the mortgage now in suit was executed on the 3rd August 1904. The terms of this mortgage were most favourable to the mortgagor, for he was given $4\frac{1}{2}$ years to pay off the debt of Rs. 450, due under the former mortgage, by nine six-monthly instalments of Rs. 50, payable at the end of Jus and Jeth in each year, without interest. The same property was again mortgaged. It was agreed, however, that if default was made in the payment of the instalments, the mortgagee was at liberty to cancel the arrangement as to instalments and could sue for the whole amount and charge interest at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per mensem. Default was made in the very first instalment; it was paid too late. When the money was paid, the mortgagee placed part of it towards the interest that had begun to run, and the balance was credited in reduction of the principal. Later on, various sums were paid; the second item was Rs. 50, paid on the date on which the second instalment was due. The mortgagee, however, apportioned it in the same way as he had done with the first payment, partly to pay off the interest which had accrued, and the balance towards principal. No more instalments were paid, but the mortgagor from time to time made irregular payments of varying sums, all of which were duly credited, and amounted in all to Rs 390.

The mortgagee plaintiff-respondent now sued to recover the unpaid debt plus interest as stipulated in the mortgage deed. The mortgagor was made defendant No. 1. His wife was joined as defendant No. 2, because her name appeared in the Khewat as owner of the bulk of the mortgaged property. The other defendants were subsequent purchasers or subsequent mortgagees of portions of the mortgaged property. We are not here concerned with them.

The defence to the suit of the mortgagor was that he had paid eight instalments, i. e., Rs. 400; that the mortgagee's allegation that he had paid only Rs. 390 was wrong; and that the mortgagee having accepted the instalments, he was not entitled to charge interest, and could only recover Rs. 50, due for the last instalment.

His wife's defence was that the property mortgaged did not belong to the mortgagor at the date of the mortgage, because, some six months previously, he had transferred it to her by a registered deed in lieu of her dower-debt of Rs. 25,000, which was unpaid. The trial Court decreed the suit, but reduced the rate of interest to that of the original bond of 1897, as the plaintiff agreed to accept this rate. Both the mortgagor and his wife appealed, and their appeals were dismissed by the District Judge.

Both come here in second appeal.

The wife's appeal may be disposed of at once. Both Courts have found that the alleged transfer in her favour in lieu of dower was fraudulent, and as that finding was based on legal evidence it concludes her appeal.

On behalf of the mortgagor two grounds have been pressed:—

(1) "Because when the mortgagee did not exercise his right to enforce the penalty but continually accepted irregular payments, it amounted to a waiver in law."

(2) "Because a personal decree more than six years after the accrual of the right is against law, and such claim was barred by time."

We can dispose of the second ground at once; it has been found that the last payment was made on 8th July 19 2 and the suit was instituted within six years of that date; the personal liability, therefore, had been kept alive, and the personal decree was not barred.

The first ground of appeal is based on the ruling of this Court in Sakhawat Husain v. Gajadhar Prasad (1). But before we can see whether that ruling is applicable, we must see what were the facts found. The first instalment was due on the 4th February 1905. It was not paid till some days afterwards. The next instalment of Rs. 50 was paid on the 3rd July 1905, which was the due date of the second instalment; no other instalment was paid on the stipulated dates, but various sums were paid from time to time, the last being a sum of Rs. 102, paid about the 8th July 1912; and it has been found that Rs. 350 only, and not Rs. 400, had been paid by the mortgagors. As we have shown above, default was made at the first instalment and the mortgagee at once began to charge interest. The second instalment was not received by him as an instalment towards the principal debt. The mortgagee admittedly gave receipts for all payments made; the mortgagor has produced only four of these, and they all show that the receipts were not given for instalments as such or for any particular instalment, but merely as payments towards the principal and interest due under the bond. Apparently as the District Judge finds, the mortgagor did not ask the mortgagee to accept the payments as instalments and he certainly knew from the receipts that the mortgagee had not so treated them. These being the facts, the ruling relied upon does not apply.

Then it was argued that the mortgagee must be taken to have accepted the second instalment of Rs. 50 paid on its due date as an instalment, and that that fact at once and for ever prevented him from enforcing his right to interest, because in law it amounted to a waiver. But as we have pointed out, it is found that he did not so accept it; but, even if he did, the argument is unsound. See Ramdhani Sahu v. Lalit Singh (2). There eight instalments, though irregularly made, had been accepted and default was made in the two last instalments. The plaintiff claimed to recover the balance due on the bond with interest as stipulated in case of default. The lower Courts held that the plaintiff had waived the defaults made by the mortgagor, and was entitled only for the balance due on the last two instalments. This Court held that as the bond gave the mortgagee the right to recover the whole of the balance due upon failure to pay any instalment, the plaintiff was entitled upon default being made in the payment of the 9th instalment to sue for whatever amount remained due to him under the bond. In that particular case the plaintiff, in appeal, did not claim interest, except from the date of the decree of the first Court, and that this Court allowed him. In that case, too, the ruling of Sakhawat Husain v. Gajadhar Prasad (1) was relied upon but it was distinguished in the following terms:

"That case is clearly distinguishable from the present. In that case as in the present some instalments, though paid irregularly, had been received, but the suit was brought after all the instalments had become due and the only question was whether the plaintiff was entitled to interest in accordance with the terms of the bond, such interest being payable in case of default being made in the payment of any instalment. It was held that the creditor, having received the amounts of the instalments which had been irregularly paid, was not entitled to interest on those amounts." We note that Stanley, C. J., was a party to both decisions.

Following this ruling, even if the second

(2) 5 A. L. J. 609 A. W. N. (1908) 255

instalment be treated as an instalment paid and received as such, it was still open to the mortgagee if default was made in future, as it was, to sue for the balance of his debt with interest. A note is made in Rustomji's Law of Limitation, 2nd Edition, at page 297, which seems in point and appears to us to be good law. He says: "The law now appears to be that such payment and acceptance is sufficient evidence of waiver, but the payment must be on account of the specific instalment in arrear and not a mere payment in reduction of the whole debt, (i. e., a mere payment on account generally will not suffice)." This note is stated to be based on an unreported ruling of a Divisional Bench of this Court, but the reference given is wrong and we cannot trace it. In the case before us it has been held that the payments made were made generally in reduction of the debt.

The result is, the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Mr. B. L. Mitter, Babus Provas Chandra Mitter, Ambicapada Chowdhury and Mr. A. S. Aiyer, for the Appellant.

Dr. Sarat Chandra Basak and Babu Krishna Kishore Basak, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by one of the creditors of an insolvent, whose contention that he is in the position of a secured creditor has been overruled by the District Judge. The decision of this question depends upon the legal effect of an order made by this Court on the 7th March 1918. At that time a suit had been instituted by the appellant against his debtor. Two proceedings were before the Court, one an application for attachment before judgment under Order XXXVIII, Civil Procedure Code, the other an application by the debtor for leave to defend the suit instituted against him under Order XXXVII, Civil Procedure Code. On the 7th March an order was made by consent. The material part of the order was in these terms: "Upon the defendant consenting to the interim attachment of his property and also consenting to the said property being considered as charged with the re payment of the amount of the plaintiff's claim in this suit, it is ordered that the defendant, within a fortnight from the date hereof furnishing security to the extent of Rs. 5,000, be at liberty to appear in and defend the suit, and it is ordered that the said affidavit be considered as his written statement in this suit with liberty to file a supplementary written statement." Notwithstanding this consent order, the defendant neither appeared nor defended the suit; nor was security furnished. The question in controversy is, whether the charge created by this consent order was intended to be in operation for the two weeks allowed to the debtor to furnish security or whether the intention was that the charge should remain in operation till re-payment of the amount of the claim. The District Judge has adopted the former view; in our opinion, it is fairly clear that the latter alternative is correct. The security was to be for Rs. 5,000 only. At the date of the order it was doubtful whether the security would ever be furnished. The creditors obtained a consent order which gave them a charge on the property attached, a charge to secure re-payment of the entire amount of their claim. It is not probable that the contention could have been that this charge should be of a temporary character and should be in operation for two weeks only, at the end of which period it might transpire that no security was furnished.

The result is that this appeal is allowed, the order of the District Judge set aside and the case remitted to him with the intimation that the charge created by the consent order must be deemed, not of a temporary character, but subsisting till re payment of the claim in the suit. The appellant is entitled to his costs of this appeal. We assess the hearing fee at five gold mohurs.

We may add that it has been suggested by the respondent that other questions arise which may require discussion. It is impossible for us to deal with such questions here; they must be dealt with by the District Judge. It has also been faintly argued that the appeal is not competent, because all the creditors of the insolvent have not been joined as parties. In our opinion, it is not necessary to bring them before the Court. The Receiver is a party respondent. He is in charge of the estate and the duty is cast upon him to distribute the assets amongst the creditors subject to such directions as may be given by the Court. Two of the creditors have obtained leave from this Court to be heard in support of the order made by the District Judge. The other creditors did not appear to contest the claim of the appellant, nor have they expressed a desire to be heard in this Court. In these circumstances, it is impossible to hold that the creditors who have hitherto taken no interest whatsoever in these proceedings, should all be directed to appear here so that the matter in controversy may be discussed in their presence.

Let the record be sent down as soon as possible so that the case may be taken up at an early date.

Mortgage by conditional sale—Mortgagor, minor, living as member of joint Hindu family with co-mortgagor—Notice of demand on co-mortgagor, whether sufficient notice to minor—Foreclosure, application for—Demand, whether should immediately precede application.

In the case of a mortgage by conditional sale by two brothers one of whom is a minor and lives with his brother as a member of a joint Hindu family, a notice of demand received by the major for himself and as guardian of his minor brother is sufficient notice to the latter. [p. 12, col. 1.]

The mere fact that a demand does not immediately precede an application to foreclose a mortgage, but was made some time previous to the application for foreclosure, is not a defect which would invalidate the proceedings held upon such application. [p. 12, col. 2.]

First appeal from the decree of the Divisional Judge, Delhi, dated the 6th August 1914.

Lala Moti Sagar, R. S., and Mr. Balwant Rai, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Lakshmi Narain and Ralli, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the plaintiff sued for possession by foreclosure of mortgaged property. His suit was dismissed on the ground that the foreclosure proceedings were not regular and sufficient, no demand having been made for payment immediately before the application for notice of foreclosure. The learned Judge cited Hazara Singh v. Muhammad Khan (1) as an authority that a demand immediately preceding the application for notice of foreclosure was necessary. On appeal before us Counsel urges that the view taken in this judgment does not correctly represent the law and that the ratio decidendi of this judgment is also faulty.

As Counsel for the respondents has contended before us that there is no proof on the record of the service of any notice of demand, it is first necessary for us to discuss the evidence on this subject. The plaintiff states that many demands were made previous to the application for notice of foreclosure, which was dated the 15th of May 1911. The application contains a statement to this effect, though the relevant words have been omitted from the translation on page 20 of the paper book. He relies, however, especially on a registered notice, dated the 30th of August 1909, which was served upon Hira Lal for himself and as guardian of Kapur Chand, the other mortgagor. There appears to us to be no doubt that this registered notice was received by Hira Lal. He is now dead, but there is reliable evidence as to his signature given by Sardari Mal. It was also contended by Mr. Ralli for the respondents that the notice of demand was defective, inasmuch as Hira Lal was not the guardian of the minor Kapur Chand. The learned District Judge, citing Ras Muni Dibiah v. Pran Kishen Das (2) and Lal Singh v. Gopal Das (3), considered the service sufficient as the minor was living with his relation. In addition to this, we notice that a guardianship application printed on page 30 of the paper-book shows that Hira Lal and Kapur Chand were living together and we may also note that this guardianship application was dismissed on the ground that Kapur Chand and Hira Lal formed members of a joint Hindu family. We consider, therefore, that there is no doubt that a registered notice of demand was served upon Hira Lal in August 1909, while as we have stated the application for foreclosure was dated the 15th of May 1911. We have next to consider whether the delay in the making of the application is in any way fatal to the present case.

In Hazara Singh v. Muhammad Khan (1) the main objection taken appears to have been that no demand previous to the application for foreclosure had been made. This objection was upheld, and any further decision on the question of a demand immediately preceding the issue of the application for foreclosure was unnecessary. The remarks on this question, therefore, were obiter. They were also not based upon any authority nor upon the Regulation of 1803. They were merely based upon the ground that the mortgage money would ordinarily vary in amount with the lapse of time and that the demand ought to be for the amount for which the notice was issued. We do not think that this ratio decidendi is sound, as in every case there must be some delay between the demand and the issue of the application for foreclosure, and there must, therefore, always be some variation between the amount demanded and the amount for which the notice is issued. Moreover, a mortgagor is in no way prejudiced by any delay between the demand and the application for foreclosure. Indeed, the delay is to his advantage as it gives him further opportunity to arrange for payment. Counsel for the appellant has cited many other authorities in support of his contentions which we may notice briefly. In Bhagirath v. Nath Mal (4) it was not considered necessary to state in the notice the precise sum demanded. In Dalip Singh v. Jaimal Singh (5) a notice issued under the Regulation was not considered defective merely because the amount due was wrongly stated. The same was the decision in Barkat Ali v. Ali (6). These authorities are somewhat in favour of the appellant, but he does not really require their assistance, as there is no authority for the contention that a demand should immediately precede the application for foreclosure.

Mr. Ralli for the respondents also endeavoured to uphold the decision of the District Judge on the ground that a notice of the application for foreclosure was not served on a subsequent mortgagee. This point was not taken before the District Appeal from the decision of Mr. Skinner, Additional Judicial Commissioner, Central Provinces, dated the 19th April 1910.

Messrs. DeGruyther, K. C., and G. M. Parekh, for the Appellants.

JUDGMENT.

SIR JOHN EDGE.—These are two consolidated appeals from a decree, dated the 19th April 1910, of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of the Central Provinces, which reversed two decrees, dated the 8th and 22nd June 1908, of the District Judge of Saugor, and dismissed two suits for sale which were tried together. The plaintiffs are the appellants.

The suits, No. 1 of 1905 and No. 2 of 1905, in which these appeals have arisen were respectively brought on the 7th January 1905 in the Court of the District Judge. Suit No. 1 of 1905 was brought on a mortgage of the 2nd July 1893 by mortgagees or their representatives against Bhaiyalal Dube, the mortgagor, and his son Murlidhar Dube to recover Rs. 59,999, including principal, interest and compound interest, by the sale of six villages to which the mortgage applied. The principal sum of that mortgage was Rs. 30,000. The particulars of the account as given in the plaint showed Rs 30,000 as the principal sum, interest and compound interest to the 3rd January 1905 amounting to Rs. 28,190-5-0 and Rs. 1,462-4-0 charged as having been paid by the mortgagees as Government revenue on the 29th August 1902, and Rs. 411-14-0 interest on that sum of Rs. 1,462 4 0. By the particulars Rs. 65-7-0 of the total of Rs. 64,064-7-0 was relinquished, leaving as a result the Rs. 59,999 in respect of which a decree for sale was sought. In the particulars no moneys were credited as having been received by the mortgagees.

Suit No. 2 of 1905 was brought on a mortgage of the 30th June 1892 by the same plaintiffs against Bhaiyalal Dube, the mortgagor, his son, Murlidhar Dube, and Bhaiyalal Dube's wife, Latkari Bahu, to recover Rs. 59,887-3-6 by sale of five other villages to which that mortgage applied. The principal sum of the mortgage was Rs. 40,000. The particulars of the account as given in the plaint showed Rs. 40,000 as the principal sum, interest and compound interest to the 3rd January 1905 Rs. 15,101-9-0 and Rs. 3,734-12-6 charged as having been paid by the mortgagees as Government revenue, and Rs. 1,050-14 0 interest on that sum of Rs 3,734-12-6, making a total of Rs. 59,887-3 6 in respect of which a decree for sale was sought. In the particulars no moneys were credited as having been received by the mortgagees.

The principal defence in each suit was substantially that the mortgage had been satisfied, and that there was nothing due.

The defendant Murlidhar Dube was born on the 16th July 1894, and on his birth he and his father Bhaiyalal Dube constituted, until they separated, a joint Hindu family governed by the Law of Mitakshara. The property mortgaged was ancestral property. Bhaiyalal Dube was a young man of defective education and of vicious and immoral habits. He was not a man of business, and he was incompetent to manage the family property, which consisted of the villages mortgaged and of several other villages.

The history of the case may be divided into three periods in relation to the rights, powers and liabilities of Bhaiyalal and his son Murlidhar. The periods were from the 30th June 1892 to the birth of Murlidhar on the 16th July 1894; from the 16th July 1894 to January 1895, when Bhaiyalal's wife and her son Murlidhar were obliged to leave his house and to live separately from him in consequence of the profligate misconduct of Bhaiyalal; and from January 1895 to the filing of the suits.

The original mortgagees consisted of a joint Hindu family of which Nandkishore, now dead, was the managing member and in the transaction between the parties to which reference will be made he represented the family, and the other members of that family need not be specifically referred to.

On the 1st July 1892 Bhaiyalal Dube executed an agreement by which he appointed Nandkishore manager and Receiver of all his property, moveable and immoveable, for 10 years, and put Nandkishore in possession. Under that agreement Nandkishore was to keep accounts and to explain them to Bhaiyalal Dube in July of each year, and was to receive certain remuneration for his work. Nandkishore as the managing member of his joint Hindu family continued in possession of the property until about April 1894, when Bhaiyalal Dube determined the agreement of the 1st July 1892; but it is not clear that the determination of that agreement involved the resumption by Bhaiyalal of the control of his property, and there appears to be some ground for saying that Nandkishore's management continued until the execution of the agreement next referred to. It has been alleged by the plaintiffs that on the determination of the agreement of 1892, Nandkishore handed over to Bhaiyalal Dube all the account books which had come into his possession. On behalf of the defendants it has been denied that any account books were handed over by Nandkishore to Bhaiyalal. The presumption is that Nandkishore must have kept accounts, showing what he had received and what he had expended while the property was in his possession. No such accounts have been produced.

On the 2nd February 1895 Bhaiyalal Dube executed another agreement by which Nandkishore was appointed manager of all Bhaiyalal's property except certain bungalows and houses in Sangor, and Nandkishore was put in possession. That agreement contained the following clauses amongst others:—

"So, thinking the business to be your own, you will look after the management of the villages, grants, gardens, sir, birs (grass reserves), and forests, of cash and grain debts, old and new, due to me, in Sangor District or elsewhere, and of the land revenue collections, grant leases up to three years without my permission, and for a longer period than three years with my permission, take kabuliyats (counterparts), have them registered, have land prepared for cultivation, collect land revenue, credit Government dues, and pay necessary village expenses. You have the power to do all these works for me and in my interests. You may with permission discontinue sir wherever you think fit, and give sir land for cultivation, and add more to the sir area where you may think proper to do so. Besides the debts due to you, I have also to pay other creditors. And in some instances, I have borrowed at a higher rate of interest. So, you will devise means to liquidate that debt first, from my profits and agreeably to my wishes. You will realise money from persons indebted to me in cash or in grain by mutual agreement or by suit, conducting it personally or through Pleader or Barrister or Agent appointed for the purpose or by attachment, etc, and receive money from the Treasury or Courts, passing a receipt therefor. Be paying to me for my expenses Rs. 250 two hundred and fifty a month, at the beginning of each month, debiting the same to my account. In case I stand in need of some more money for some urgent personal business, such as marriage, etc., you will have to pay me to the extent of Rs. 1,000 a year. Take a receipt from me for whatever money you pay, and enter it in my account in my name. I will see and understand the accounts every half year."

* * * *

"This agreement will last till the liquidation of the whole debt due to you, which is based upon bahi-khatas (account books) and mortgage deeds. In case I pay off your money with interest either by borrowing from others or by selling my property if I like, I will take back the said management from you. If at any time I were to sell the property mortgaged to you for repayment of the debts due to you, you will have to grant me permission, and I will have this right also that I may take at any time I think fit the management of the estate other than that mortgaged to you. You have my permission to appoint a general agent and to have the power-of-attorney registered."

* * * *

The Judicial Commissioner considered that the effect of that agreement was to place the mortgagees, on whose behalf Nandkishore acted, in the position of mortgagees in possession, so far as the mortgaged property was concerned, and that it was his duty to account to the mortgagor. With that view of the situation their Lordships agree. While Nandkishore was in possession under the deed of the 2nd February 1895, some of the mortgaged villages and other villages of Bhaiyalal and Murlidhar were sold by Nandkishore; the sale proceeds of the villages so sold amounted to Rs. 94,208-14-0. Nandkishore's management of the property continued until sometime in 1897 or 1898, when apparently he ceased to have possession of any of the property then unsold.

Of the villages so sold some were purchased by Nandkishore.

On behalf of the plaintiffs it was alleged that Bhaiyalal Dube owed to the original mortgagees large sums (khata debts) in addition to those secured by the two mortgages, and that moneys received by Nandkishore during his management were applied to the discharge of these debts and other liabilities of Bhaiyalal, leaving the mortgage-debts due to the mortgagees unsatisfied, and reliance was placed in support of that contention on the fact that Bhaiyalal had signed some acknowledgments which were put in evidence. It was on behalf of the defendants alleged that Nandkishore had induced Bhaiyalal to sign papers which he did not understand. The Subordinate Judge stated in his judgment: "As for the question of undue influence, there is not the least doubt in my mind Bhaiyalal was completely under the dominating influence of the Lala Nandkishore." One of the documents which was relied upon as an acknowledgment was a paper, Exhibit P-15, dated the 13th September 1895, which Bhaiyalal alleged was extorted from him on the 10th December 1898. As to that paper the Subordinate Judge stated in his judgment: "I have no hesitation whatever in holding that Exhibit P-15 is not a genuine document, but that it was executed at the urging of Nandkishore long after the date it is made to bear." The Judicial Commissioner gave no credence to any of the alleged acknowledgments signed by Bhaiyalal nor do their Lordships. The alleged khata debts were entered in the books of Nandkishore without a single item of credit being shown in respect of them in his books. Their Lordships are forced to regard those entries of khata debts as fictitious, and as made with the object of accounting for some of the money which Nandkishore had received on account of Bhaiyalal and Murlidhar. The Trial Judge found that the debts (khata debts), other than the bond debts under the two mortgages, were not proved "owing to the absence of accounts of management, which I hold were suppressed and made away with by Nandkishore, or those acting under him."

The Trial Judge, acting on evidence which was far from conclusive and was untrustworthy, found that for principal under the mortgage of the 30th June 1892 there was due Rs. 4,785-10-6 and for principal under the mortgage of the 2nd July 1893 there was due Rs. 15,129-0-5, which included a charge of Rs 1,874-2-0 charged on the village Sahawan only, and adding some compound interest he found that the total amount due was Rs. 25,971-10-8 and made a decree for sale. From that decree there was an appeal by the plaintiff to the Judicial Commissioner, and objections to the decree were filed by the defendants.

B. L. RAI v. BHAIYALAL.

On the appeal the Judicial Commissioner, as their Lordships construe his judgment found that the plaintiffs had failed to prove that there was anything due under either of the mortgages and by his decree he dismissed the plaintiffs' appeal and allowing the objections filed by the defendants he dismissed the two suits. He rightly, in their Lordships' opinion, found that Bhaiyalal's alleged acknowledgments were worthless. He found that Nandkishore was in a position to dominate Bhaiyalal's will, and was also in a fiduciary relation to him. In his judgment he stated:

"Under the first deed (that of 1st July 1892) he (Nandkishore) was in my opinion a trustee. Under the second (that of 2nd February 1895) he became a mortgagee in possession under a document which expressly provided for liquidation of his debts and that mortgaged property as well as other property of the mortgagor should remain in his possession till they were liquidated. This Court has repeatedly held that if a mortgagee not entitled to possession of the mortgaged property by the terms of his mortgage takes possession thereof, whilst his mortgage subsists, his possession is not adverse to the mortgagor, but is that of a mortgagee under section 76 of the Transfer of Property Act, the terms of which are very wide. See Prabhudan v. Bhikulal (1) and Munji v. Kishen (2). And this is a stronger case, possession having admittedly been taken under an express agreement between the parties providing for liquidation of the mortgage-debt. In both capacities it was Nandkishore's business to keep accounts, as a trustee under section 19 of the Indian Trusts Act, whilst as a mortgagee he was required by section 76 (g) of the Transfer of Property Act to keep them during the continuance of the mortgage. Whatever, therefore, became of the accounts, which Nandkisore kept as agent of Bhaiyalal, and which I am by no means satisfied that he ever made over to Bhaiyalal, he was bound, if he wished to enforce his mortgage, to keep in his own interest accounts showing how he had discharged his steward-ship, that the alleged further advances to Bhaiyalal had been really necessary, that the income of Bhaiyalal's property had been properly applied, and that it had not been possible to reduce the mortgages by more than the amount out of the sale-proceeds of villages for which the plaintiffs have given the defendants credit. This the plaintiffs are admittedly now unable to do. The so-called khata of Bhaiyalal consists of a succession of alleged advances to him from the 25th July 1892 to the 31st May 1894, the four largest of which form the consideration of the second mortgage of the 2nd July 1893. There are no countervailing credits, and no attempt has been made to show what has become of the numerous sums that Nandkishore must have received as manager of Bhaiyalal's estate besides those obtained from the sale of villages. Bhaiyalal's acknowledgments are in my opinion under these circumstances of no value, and cannot be made to supply the want of accounts, though had accounts of Nandkishore's stewardship been forthcoming they might have been important admissions of their correctness. I need not, therefore, go at any length into the question of the genuineness of Exhibit P 15, as to which I am, however, inclined to agree with the lower Court. The defendants cannot in my opinion re-open in these proceedings the sales of villages—not even of those purchased by Nandkishore, which, as the suits have been framed, are not in question in them, though they might possibly have been entitled to do so in properly framed redemption suits. And they certainly cannot re open the sales to persons who are not parties to this litigation. But the plaintiffs, for the reason I have indicated, cannot, in my opinion, enforce their mortgages."

Their Lordships do not assent to the statement that Nandkishore was by the first deed a trustee within the meaning of the Indian Trusts Act, but on the evidence to which their attention has been directed, they see no reason for dissenting from the conclusions as to facts of the Judicial Commissioner. In the view which they take of this case, it is not necessary for them to consider whether any of the alleged acknowledgments of Bhaiyalal relied upon by the plaintiffs could if proved, have been binding on his minor son Murlidhar. This is not an ordinary case of a suit for sale based on a mortgage in which it would be for the defendant, the mortgagor, to prove that nothing remained due under the mortgage, if that was his defence. This is, as it is to be hoped it is, quite an exceptional case, in which it appears to their Lordships that it was for the plaintiffs to prove that the mortgages had not been satisfied and what, if anything, was due under each mortgage before they could get a decree for sale. Bhaiyalal, a very young man leading a most immoral life, mortgaged the ancestral property of his family to Nandkishore, and gave Nandkishore possession practically of all his property, which included other villages not mortgaged to Nandkishore. A considerable part of the property of which Nandkishore had obtained possession, including some of the mortgaged villages, was sold by Nandkishore, and some of the mortgaged villages were purchased by him. Nandkishore did not, nor did the plaintiffs, render accounts of what had been received by him from or in respect of any of the property, not even of that which had been mortgaged to Nandkishore's family, on whose behalf he acted. Bhaiyalal was completely under the influence of Nandkishore, an unscrupulous man, who exercised that influence regardless of the interest of Bhaiyalal and his infant son. The plaintiffs are unable to prove that anything is due under either of the mortgages in suit.

(2) Second Appeal No. 561 of 1908.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that these consolidated appeals should be dismissed. As the respondents have not appeared, there will be no costs of these appeals.

JUDGMENT.

ADAMI, J.—The appellant obtained a decree against a Ghatwal and sought to take in execution a sum of about Rs. 622, which had been collected by a Receiver after the Ghatwal's death as arrears of rent which had fallen due during the lifetime of the Ghatwal.

The learned Subordinate Judge has found that this sum is not the personal property of the Ghatwal and, therefore, could not come into the hands of the Ghatwal's successor but into those of the next Ghatwal.

The only question which arises in this appeal is whether arrears of rent accruing during the lifetime of the Ghatwal but collected after his death are to be treated as his personal property. The decisions in Kshoora Komaree v. Benoeram Sein (1) and Rajkeshwar Deo v. Bunshidhur Marwari (2) clearly show that the surplus proceeds collected during the lifetime of the Ghatwal become his personal property. That being so, it seems clear that sums which fell due to the Ghatwal during his lifetime would after his death have the same character as they had during his lifetime. Therefore, the surplus proceeds collected in the present case after the death of the Ghatwal would also be held to be the personal property of the Ghatwal coming into the hands of his widow and could be followed in her hands by the decree holder.

I would, therefore, set aside the order of the learned Subordinate Judge and allow the appeal with costs.

COUTTS, J.—I agree. There can be no possible doubt that surplus rents due to a Ghatwal and collected during his lifetime can be attached as his personal property, and I can see no reason how the mere collection of these rents after his death can affect their character.

II, r. 2—Separate covenants in same deed—Separate suits, whether barred—Mortgage by conditional sale—Provision for payment by instalments—Personal covenant—Foreclosure in case of default—Default made—Suit for foreclosure dismissed—Subsequent suit for instalments in default, whether maintainable.*

A mortgage-deed provided for the payment of the mortgage money by 22 annual instalments, and contained a personal covenant to pay the annual instalments and provided that in the case of default for three or five years the mortgagee could foreclose for that amount. Five successive defaults were committed and the mortgagee sued for foreclosure, alleging that the whole mortgage money had become payable. The suit was dismissed on the ground that the mortgagee was not entitled to call in the whole of the mortgage-money. The mortgagee then brought the present suit for a personal decree for recovery of the instalments in arrear, and the question was whether the cause of action was the same in both suits and whether the suit was maintainable:

Held, that the suit was maintainable as in the former suit the mortgagee was seeking to enforce the mortgage while in the present suit he was asking only for instalments which had fallen due. [p. 19, col. 1.]

Where two covenants are contained in the same deed, but the performance of each is secured in a different way, such covenants give rise to separate causes of action and although they may be joined in the same suit, Order II, rule 2, of the Civil Procedure Code would not prevent separate suits being instituted on them. [p. 19, col. 1.]

Mr. M. V. Joshi, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Atmaram Bhagwant and D. W. Kathalay, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The only point argued before me is that the suit is barred by Order II, rule 2. The suit is based upon a mortgage-bond which provides for the payment of the mortgage money by 22 annual instalments. It is described as a simple mortgage, but is really an anomalous mortgage. There is a personal covenant to pay the annual instalments, but there is also a stipulation which has been translated thus: "If I fail to repay yearly instalments for three or five years, I will allow the mortgaged property to be foreclosed for that much amount without raising an objection that the period has yet to expire." In 1914 the plaintiff instituted a suit for foreclosure on the allegation that by reason of five successive defaults the whole mortgage money had become payable. The suit was dismissed on two grounds. In the first place, the Courts held that the plaintiff was not entitled to call in the whole of the mortgage money under the covenant referred to above. In the second place, it was held that the covenant was void for uncertainty. In the Appellate Court the plaintiff asked that he may be given at least a decree for the defaulted instalments but was told that he had not sued for the instalments as such. This is an indication that in the opinion of the District Judge the cause of action then sued upon did not include a claim for the instalments. It is difficult to hold in these circumstances that there was a splitting of demand in the former suit. The plaintiff now seeks a personal decree for the recovery of the instalments in arrear, but some of the instalments had fallen due before the institution of the previous suit. The question is whether the cause of action is the same in both the suits. In the former the plaintiff based his cause of action upon five defaults and claimed that the whole money became payable and that he was entitled to a decree for foreclosure. He was seeking to enforce the mortgage as one by conditional sale upon the happening of the contingency which according to him gave him a right to enforce this remedy. Here the plaintiff is suing upon a personal covenant to pay, though he might have also claimed a sale decree. He asks only for instalments which have already fallen due. Both the covenants are contained in the same mortgage-deed, but the performance of each is secured in a different way. I think the case comes within the principle recognised by Farran, C. J., in Yashvant v. Vithal (1). There it was held that whilst all existing breaches of the same contract must be joined in the same suit, although they may have arisen at different times, there may be two separate contracts contained in the same instrument, the performance of each being secured in a different manner. Such separate contracts give rise to separate causes of action, and although they may be joined in the same suit, Order II, rule 2, would not prevent separate suits being instituted on them. I, therefore, hold that the suit is maintainable. The appeal fails and is dismissed with c[illegible].

The Hon'ble Mian Fazl-i-Husain, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—One Sarfraz Khan died in 1909 leaving two widows and two sons, one the plaintiff, the other defendant No. 1, also landed property in several villages, among others the land in village Sarga Brahma with which we are concerned in this appeal. In 1910 after some competition with Amir Haidar, the eldest son of Sarfraz Khan, Musammat Nur Ilahi was appointed by the District Judge guardian of the property and person of her minor son Ghulam Haidar; the same order accepted the appointment of Muhammad Sadiq to manage the minor's estate on behalf of the guardian. In May 1911 Amir Haidar applied to the Revenue Authorities for partition of the joint estate and the partition was completed in December 1912.

The present appeal arises out of a suit lodged on behalf of the minor in 1915 for a declaration that the land partitioned in 1912 is still the joint property of himself and his elder half brother Amir Haidar, defendant No. 1, and that consequently the partition of 1912 is not binding upon him. The plaintiff, after setting forth the circumstances above recited, alleges that Muhammad Sadiq betrayed his trust and colluded in the partition proceedings with defendant Amir Haidar, with the result that the share of the land allotted to the plaintiff was of poor quality and comprised none of the land on which trees were growing, and he asked for the relief above mentioned on the following grounds:—

(1) that he was practically unrepresented before the Revenue Authorities;

(2) that the partition had in fact resulted in great loss to him;

(3) that in making the partition the Revenue Officer has taken no account of the trees; and

(4) that the partition was effected without the sanction of the District Judge and was, therefore, not binding on the plaintiff.

All these matters have been dilated upon before us at some considerable length. But the Court below, having found that the minor was properly represented before the revenue officials through his mother, who was not only his guardian ad litem but also the guardian of his person and property duly appointed by the District Judge and who being a pardadar woman was herself represented by her brother holding her general power of attorney and also special power of attorney to act for the minor in the partition proceedings, has dismissed the suit on the ground that it strikes directly at the formal proceedings of the Revenue Authorities and impugns the correctness of their method of partition and, therefore, a Civil Court has no jurisdiction to entertain it.

During the pendency of the appeal in this Court the appellant has attained majority and, on his application, has been allowed to conduct this appeal as one of full age. From the foregoing it will appear that the sole question before us is whether the suit is entertainable by a Civil Court. The learned Counsel for the appellant has referred us to several rulings, which are quite irrelevant inasmuch as they deal with disputes concerning the measure of right in land to be divided. But in this case there is no dispute as to the measure of right; the sole dispute is as to the correctness and propriety of the partition proceeding and whether by reason of certain defects of procedure in the Revenue Officer's proceedings and deficiency of conduct on the part of the minor's representative the partition should be held to be inoperative as against the plaintiff. Dasondhi v. Buta (1) and Gulab Singh v. Musammat Sukhan (2) are the only two rulings quoted which appear to us to have a bearing on the subject under discussion. In Dasondhi v. Buta (2) it was held that a suit by reversioners who claimed a declaration that a partition effected by a widow with a mere life estate should not be binding upon them was a matter for decision by a Civil Court. The ratio decidendi in that case clearly was that the action did not impugn the partition so far as the parties to it were concerned and the relief claimed could be granted without affecting the partition which had actually taken place. In Gulab Singh v. Musammat Sukhan (2) the facts of which were practically similar to those of Dasondhi v. Buta (1), it was held that the presence or absence of fraud did not affect the jurisdiction and the Civil Courts had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit.

Now section 158 (2) (xvii) of the Land Revenue Act excludes from the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts any question arising out of proceedings for partition, provided such a question is not a question of title in any of the property covered by the application for partition; and section 158 (1) prohibits a Civil Court from taking cognisance of the manner in which a Revenue Officer exercises any power vested in him under the Revenue Act. It is true the Revenue Officer did not specifically refer to the trees in his method of partition; nor did he carry out the partition in the manner prescribed by himself in his order, for instead of effecting the partition by the drawing of lots he permitted the minor's representative to select one of the two portions drawn upon the spot; nor did he expressly give sanction as provided for in Order XXXII, rule 7, to the agreement between the minor's representative and Amir Haidar to take shares by selection instead of by drawing of lots; nor was that agreement sanctioned by the District Judge under section 29 of the Guardians and Wards Act, but these defects, in our opinion, do not give the Civil Courts jurisdiction in face of the clear prohibition set forth in section 158 of the Land Revenue Act. At the time of the partition there was no dispute as to title in the land to be partitioned and the plaintiff's grievances arise solely out of the manner in which the land was actually allotted. Those grievances he is at liberty to urge either by way of review or by way of appeal before the proper revenue officer but not before a Civil Court.

For these reasons we dismiss the appeal with costs, leaving the appellant to pursue his remedy on the revenue side.

JUDGMENT.

LORD DUNEDIN.—The plaintiff and appellant in this suit, Baldeo, is in right of an 8 anna share of certain property which belonged to Gulabsingh, as attested by a certificate of sale, the property having been sold by virtue of a mortgage. Having obtained his certificate on the 31st October 1911 he applied for and got a warrant for possession on the 8th November 1911. This warrant was in the form suitable for obtaining actual physical possession, being Form No. 11 pursuant to rule 35 (1) of Order XXI of the Civil Procedure Code. Being obstructed in obtaining possession, he, on the 21st November 1911, presented an application to be put into possession. This being resisted by one Gokullal, who was not the judgment debtor and not instigated by the judgment-debtor, the application was dismissed under rule 99 of Order XXI on the 12th January 1912. On the 23rd January 1912, Baldeo presented another application to be given constructive possession, as under rule 35 (2), by having the certificate affixed to the garhi and proclaimed by beat of drum. This, after some obstruction, was done on the 12th April 1912. Following on this, Baldeo attempted to take physical possession of some of the lands. This was resisted and resulted in a riot. The matter was taken up by the Magistrate under section 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code, who, on the 9th December 1912, passed an order declaring that the resisters were in physical possession of the lands and forbidding all disturbance of them until they should be evicted in due course of law.

On the 10th February 1913 the appellant raised the present proceedings. In his plaint he asked to be put in possession of the 8 anna share of the Mouza Nankathi. The defendants and respondents denied his right, asserted that the whole mouza belonged to them, and, inter alia, pleaded that the suit was time barred under Article 11 A of the schedule of the Limitation Act of 1908. This Article is as follows:—

"DESCRIPTION OF SUIT.

"By a person against whom an order has been made under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, upon an application by the holder of a decree for the possession of immoveable property or by the purchaser of such property sold in execution of a decree, complaining of resistance or obstruction to the delivery of possession thereof, or upon an application by any person dispossessed of such property in the delivery of possession thereof to the decree-holder or purchaser, to establish the right which he claims to the present possession of the property comprised in the order."

"(Period of limitation—one year from the date of the order.)"

The Trial Judge found that the appellant was in right of the 8-anna share and that the 8-anna share belonging to Gulabsingh was an 8 anna share of the mouza. He also found that the suit was not time-barred as he considered that the suit was not for the same possession as had been claimed by the warrant of the 8th November 1911 and disposed of adversely to the applicant on the 12th January 1912, but was really based on dispossession after the symbolical possession of the 12th April 1912 and consequently not time-barred under Article 11A, which he considered inapplicable.

On appeal the Court of Appeal reversed on the latter point. The reasons for their judgment are shortly and clearly stated as follows:—

"The present suit is not one asking for possession of the kind which was granted by the Deputy Commissioner's second order on the second application. That possession was the possession of a co sharer who did not claim any physical possession, but possession through the co-sharer in actual physical possession. What is asked for in this suit is that, defendants Nos. 1 to 4 be directed to put the plaintiff in possession and control of the 8-anna share in Mouza Nankathi with its hamlet, with khudkasht land and cultivating right in sir. This appears to us to be exactly the same relief as was asked for in the first application for possession which was refused. It is not the relief asked for in the second application which was granted. The plaintiff asked to be put in actual possession and that prayer was refused, under rule 99. If an order under rule 99 entails the necessity of bringing a suit within a year, then the present suit as brought is barred."

Their Lordships agree with the view of the Court of Appeal. It was argued by the appellant that, inasmuch as Gulabsingh was only proprietor of an 8-anna share, and as the appellant's right was as a purchaser of the property of Gulabsingh as brought to sale under a mortgage, he could not be entitled to actual possession. The question, however, is not what the appellant might or ought to have asked, but what he did ask. Now that he asked for actual possession, and was refused under rule 99, is certain. It only remains to see what he asked in the present suit. Here he has made it too clear for argument. In his plaint he asks for possession and says that he took actual possession. He ignores the symbolical possession of the second order altogether. Nay, more. The respondents in their answer first of all deny that the appellant took possession, and then go on in statement 6 of their defence to narrate the application for symbolical possession. In rejoinder to this the appellant actualy denies the averments in statement 6 of the respondents' defence. It follows that the present suit, as brought, is time-barred under Article 11A.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty to dismiss the appeal. As the respondents have not appeared there will be no order as to costs.

Mr. P. K. Sen, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

COUTTS, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought on a hand-note. The defendant No. 1 was a minor at the time of the institution of the suit, and the defendant No. 2 was his mother and guardian. The hand-note was executed on the 21st Phagun 1321 for Rs. 685 by the defendant No. 2 in favour of the plaintiff. The suit was decreed in the Court of first instance against both the defendants on the findings that the hand-note was duly executed and that the minor had been benefited by the loan. On appeal to the learned District Judge, he agreed with the findings of the trial Court that the hand-note had been duly executed and that the minor had been benefited, but he dismissed the suit as against the defendant No. 1 on the ground that the hand-note was a personal covenant which could not bind the estate of the minor. Against this decision the plaintiff has appealed.

There can be no possible doubt that the view taken by the learned District Judge that the guardian cannot bind the estate of a minor by a personal covenant is a correct view of the law and as the hand note does not purport to bind the estate of the minor, the estate itself cannot be bound. In support of this proposition I need refer only to the case of Bhawal Sahu v. Baijnath Pertab Narain Singh (1).

It has been urged before us, however, by the learned Vakil for the appellant that even if this is so, the plaintiff is entitled to succeed under section 68 of the Contract Act on the ground that he had supplied the minor with necessaries suited to his condition in life. This, however, was not the case as made in the pleadings. The suit was distinctly one on the hand-note and the plaintiff would only be entitled to relief by reason of section 63 if the plaint were amended. The learned Vakil for the appellant has asked to be allowed to amend the plaint and to remand the suit for re-hearing on the amended plaint. In my opinion we would not be entitled to do this because it would clearly change the whole character of the suit, which, as I have already said, was distinctly brought on the hand-note. I see no ground for amending the plaint and without amendment the plaintiff cannot succeed in this appeal. I would accordingly dismiss this appeal with costs.

SULTAN AHMED, J.—I agree in the order that has been passed by my learned brother. I am not quite sure that if we allowed the application of the learned Vakil for the appellant, we would be changing the character of the suit, but I am satisfied that even if this application were granted, he could not succeed on the original claim inasmuch as it would be barred by limitation. I, therefore, agree that his application for amendment should not be granted and this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

The granting of a decree for specific performance is a matter for discretion, and he who asks for it must show that he has acted with diligence and good conscience If he delays in asking for it till just before his suit would be barred by limitation, he is clearly not entitled to an exercise of the discretion in his favour. Messrs. G. L. Subhedar and K. P. Vaidya, for the Appellant.

Sir B. K. Bose, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff Munir Mohammad sued to obtain specific performance of a contract to sell entered into by the first defendant Rama Patel. The undoubted facts are as follows. On 25th June 1915 Rama signed a written agreement to sell Munir Mohammad a ten-anna share of a thirteen-anna 6-pie share in the village of Khapadia with cultivating rights in the sir land provided the transfer was sanctioned by the Financial Commissioner, for which sanction he was to apply. The price was put Rs. 6,000 with the sir or Rs. 5,000 if the transfer of the sir were not sanctioned, and the conveyance was to be executed within four months. Rama duly applied to the Deputy Commissioner for sanction on 1st July 1915 mentioning Munir Mohammad as the proposed transferee. By 17th July 1915, however, Rama had changed his mind, and he agreed on that day to sell the share with the sir land to one Kisangir now deceased, the predecessor-in-interest of the other defendants, for a slightly higher price. On 26th July 1915 Rama appeared before the Extra Assistant Commissioner who was inquiring into the matter, and stated that he wished to transfer the property to Kisangir and not to Munir Mohammad. Munir Mohammad was himself present on that occasion and raised no objection. Again at the next hearing of the matter on 18th August 1915 his agent was present and was examined in respect of the money due to him by Rama, along with Rama's other creditors. Not a word was said even then about the previous agreement to sell to Munir Mohammad. The Extra Assistant Commissioner and the Deputy Commissioner recommended that the transfer of the cultivating rights in the sir land should be sanctioned and the Financial Commissioner sanctioned it. Kisangir is casually mentioned in the Deputy Commissionor's report as the proposed transferee, but there is no mention of any transferee in the report of the Extra Assistant Commissioner nor in the order of the Financial Commissioner. Up till 14th August 1918 when his claim would have been barred by time but for the agreement to execute the conveyance in four months, Munir Mohammad did nothing at all to assert his rights under the agreement of 25th June 1915. On that date he filed the suit for specific performance impleading the representatives of the deceased Kisangir.

The 12th paragraph of the judgment of the lower Court is as follows:

"The sanction to transfer cultivating rights in sir land was granted to defendant No. 1 no doubt, but it was granted in favour of Kisangir and not generally. The wording of section 45 of the Tenancy Act does not lend colour to the contention that the transferor can, after a sanction, use it for the purpose of transferring the land to any one he likes. The transferor has to make an application for transfer and the Local Government sanctions 'the transfer.' In this case the Deputy Commissioner in forwarding his report (Exhibit D 10) says the proposed sale may be sanctioned and the Financial Commissioner must be deemed to have sanctioned the particular transfer and not transfer generally." It is true that the Deputy Commissioner's report does casually mention that Kisangir is the proposed transferee, but this was entirely unnecessary. In section 45 of the Tenancy Act and the rules framed thereunder the proposed transferee is mentioned only once, that is, in rule II 2 (a), which lays down that the application for sanction must state the names of the parties to the proposed transfer. It is beyond doubt and it is admitted that the Financial Commissioner's sanction in this case was unconditional and did not restrict the transfer to any particular transferee.

The following passage from the judgment in Ramdulare v. Daryao Singh [First Appeal No. 76 of 1913, dated 4th of May 1914] explains the matter. "There is no mention in section 45 of the Tenancy Act or in any of the rules made thereunder of any particular kind of transfer except in the explanation at the end of the section, which says that a transfer includes a mortgage and a lease. The authority given by the section is merely to allow or forbid a proposed transfer. Details of the transfer proposed have, of course, to be examined to decide whether it ought to be allowed or not, and the proper authority to forbid a transfer for the reason that it is a mortgage or that it is a sale or that the consideration, inadequate or that it is to an undesirable person. But a transfer once sanctioned is a transfer by sale, lease or a mortgage or even gift to any person for any consideration. The sanction does not allow the attaching of any conditions to a permission to transfer, though they could easily be imposed in practice by a refusal of permission till the applicant agreed to certain conditions and carried them out.

Acting, however, on his view of the law and facts the learned Subordinate Judge granted a decree ordering Rama Patel to execute a conveyance of 10 anna share without cultivating rights in the sir land for Rs 5,000 and neither defendant has appealed against that decree. Munir Mohammad alone has appealed praying that the decree shall include an order for transfer of the cultivating rights in the sir land. The granting of the decree for specific performance is a matter of discretion, and he who asks for it must show that he has acted with diligence and in good conscience. Rama Patel repudiated the agreement on which he relies to his knowledge and in his presence and in circumstances he could have made effective protest, just a month after its execution. He did nothing then and nothing for three years till he filed this suit when just little two months was left to do it in. He is clearly not entitled to the exercise of the discretion of the Court in his favour and ought not to have been given a decree at all. The appeal is dismissed and the appellant must pay the costs.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), ss. 50 (2), 102 (b), 115—Tenant entered as qaimi in Cadastral Survey, effect of—Presumption under s. 50, whether permissible.

Once the status of a tenant is entered as qaimi under section 02 (b) of the Bengal Tenancy Act, no presumption can thereafter arise under section 50 of the Act from the fact of payment of rent at a uniform rate for twenty years. Section 115 of the Act clearly bars such a presumption. The object of that section is to conclude once for all the question as to the status of the tenant so far as it rests upon the presumption of twenty years' uniform payment of rent The section does not, however, bar proof of the tenancy from the time of the Permanent Settlement at a fixed rate of rent by any other means, e. g., by the production of the original grant. [p. 26, col. 2.]

Messrs. Fakhruddin and Jadubans Sahay, for the Appellant.

Mr. Bhagwan Prasad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff is the appellant. The defendant is a tenant under her in respect of a holding Khata No. 3 in village Bakharai. During the Cadastral Survey the holding was recorded as qaimi (right of occupancy). The Record of Rights of that survey was finally published on the 6th December 1897. During the revisional settlement the holding was recorded as sharah moyian (that is, at fixed rate of rent). The record of this survey was published in February or April 1916. The plaintiff, therefore, instituted the present suit under section 106, Bengal Tenancy Act, before the Survey Settlement Officer for a declaration that the defendant had only rights of occupancy in the holding and that the entry of sharah moyian or rights at fixed rate in the revisional settlement Record of Rights is incorrect.

The Assistant Settlement Officer decreed the claim of the plaintiff. On appeal the Special Judge of Muzaffarpur reversed the decision of the Assistant Settlement Officer and dismissed the plaintiff's suit. The plaintiff has, therefore, come to this Court in second appeal.

The ground upon which the learned Judge has dismissed the suit is that the defendant produced receipts showing payments of some rent from 1250 onwards and, therefore, he was entitled under section 50 (2) of the Bengal Tenancy Act to the presumption that he held the land at the same rate from the time of the Permanant Settlement, and that the Assistant Settlement Officer was wrong in depriving the defendant of this presumption under section 115 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. Section 115 runs as follows:—

"When the particulars mentioned in section 102, clause (b), have been recorded under this chapter (Chapter X) in respect of any tenancy, the presumption under section 50 shall not thereafter apply to that tenancy."

The contention of the plaintiff is that under this section the defendant was not entitled to the benefit of the presumption by payment of the uniform rate of rent for over 20 years, inasmuch as the status of the defendant was recorded as qaimi in the Cadastral Survey of 1897 under section 102, clause (b). The contention found favour with the Assistant Settlement Officer. The learned Judge has overruled it, basing his decision upon the rulings in Golab Misser v. Kumar Kalanand Singh (1), Maharaja

(1) 6 Ind. Cas. 217; 14 C. W. N. 884; 12 C. L. J. 107.

Radha Kishore Manikya Bahadur v. Umed Ali (2) and Pirthi Chand Lal Chowdhry v. Sheikh Mohamed Tahir (3). The point did not directly arise in the first of these cases. The second was a decision of a single Judge, Mr. Justice Das, and was not accepted in the Full Bench case of Pirthi Chand Lal Chowdhry v. Basarat Ali (4). The last case also was a decision of a single Judge of this Court (Mullick, J.) and was dissented from by a Division Bench of this Court in the recent case of Jagdeo Narain Singh v. Bhagwan Mahto (5).

It may also be pointed out that the aforesaid cases of Maharaja Radha Kishore Manikya Bahadur v. Umed Ali (2) and Gulab Misser v. Kumar Kalanand Singh (1) were decided before the amendment of the Bengal Tenancy Act in the years 1898 and 1903. It is not necessary to enter into a detailed discussion of the meaning and scope of section 115 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, inasmuch as it has been fully dealt with by the Calcutta High Court in the Full Bench case referred to above, which has since then been consistently and invariably followed in Calcutta up to the present time: vide Harihar Persad Bajpai v. Ajub Misir (6), Birendra Kishore Manikya Bahadur v. Faizuddi (7) and Guru Charan Nandi v. Sarab Ali (8).

So far as this Court is concerned, sitting singly I am bound to follow the decision of a Division Bench referred to above. At the same time I must point out that a sharah moyian tenant, or tenant at fixed rate, is one whose rent or rate of rent is fixed in perpetuity. In the absence of any evidence to prove the origin of the tenancy section 50 makes certain presumptions in favour of the fixity of rent. In clause (1) of the section such a presumption is raised when the rent or rate of rent is proved to have remained unchanged from the time of the Permanent Settlement. Under clause 2, payment of uniform rate of rent during the 20 years immediately preceding the institution of a suit or proceeding will be sufficient to raise a presumption of the uniform payment of rent from the time of the Permanent Settlement

Under Chapter X, section 102 (b) of the Bengal Tenancy Act, a Settlement Officer is required to record the status of a tenant, whether he is a raiyat holding at fixed rate or is an occupancy raiyat, etc. In that proceeding the Settlement Officer, therefore, is entitled to give the benefit of the presumption in favour of a tenant proving payment of rent at a uniform rate immediately preceding 20 years. At the Cadastral Survey of 1897, the Settlement Officer was apparently not satisfied as to the uniform payment of rent for 20 years and accordingly he recorded the status of the defendant as qaimi. Section 115 is plain and clear in its meaning that "thereafter" no presumption under section 50 by payment of 20 years' uniform rate of rent will apply. The object of that section was obviously to conclude once for all the question as to the status of the tenant so far as it rests upon the presumption of 20 years' uniform payment of rent. No doubt it does not bar the proof of the tenancy from the time of the Permanent Settlement at a fixed rate of rent by any other means, namely, by the production of the original grant, etc. Therefore, upon a true construction of the section I am in full accord with the view taken in the recent authorities. These authorities were apparently not brought to the notice of the learned Judge. I, therefore, agree with the view taken by the Assistant Settlement Officer.

Another ground given by the learned Judge for holding that the entry in the present Record of Rights should prevail over that in Cadastral Survey and that section 115 could not bar the presumption arising under section 50 by proof of payment of a uniform rate of rent for 20 years is that the Revisional Settlement Officer was competent to correct errors and mistakes in the original Cadastral Survey Record of Rights. This is true and as a matter of fact the Notification of the Local Government, dated the 11th August 1914, contained in the Behar and Orissa Gazette of August 1914 directs the particulars under section 102 (b), namely, the class to which a tenant belongs, to be determined and entered in the Record of Rights. At the revisional settlement, therefore, the Officer was entitled to determine the status of the defendants, namely, whether he was a raiyat holding at fixed rate or was an occupancy raiyat. But he could determine this only when there is no legal bar, as in this particular case, to his taking into evidence or raising any presumption barred by any Statute. In the present case he was quite competent to record the defendant as a sharah moyian tenant, if he had proved his right to hold at fixed rate by the production of any grant, or by showing some agreement between the landlord and himself subsequent to the Cadastral Survey, conferring upon him the rights of a tenant at fixed rate, but he was not competent to do so merely upon the presumption afforded by section 50 (2) of the Bengal Tenancy Act, the presumption under that section having been barred by section 115 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. It is patent from the judgment (Exhibit C) of the Assistant Settlement Officer that he recorded the defendant as a tenant at fixed rate simply upon the presumption under section 50. There was no other evidence before him, nor has any other evidence been produced in this case, as is expressly stated by the Assistant Settlement Officer. The judgment of the learned Judge, therefore, cannot be supported upon this ground also.

The result is that the appeal is allowed with costs.

Bombay Rent Act (II of 1918), s. 9—Object of Act—Bona fides of landlord—Court, duty of.

It was never intended by the Bombay Rent Act that the improvement of old, ill-erected, badly ventilated premises should be entirely stopped until the Rent Act is repealed. All that the Courts have to do in construing section 9 of the Bombay Rent Act is to see that the landlord is acting reasonably. [p. 27, col. 2.]

In order to determine whether a landlord is acting reasonably within the meaning of section 9 of the Bombay Rent Act, the Court should confine itself to the condition of the premises in question and should not allow its decision to be affected by the fact that the landlord owns other buildings in respect of which he should follow a certain line of action. [p. 28, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decision of Mr. Justice Kajiji.

The Hon'ble Mr. Strangman (Advocate-General), Messrs. Inverarity and Kanga, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The plaintiff brought this suit against the defendant praying that the defendant might be ordered to vacate and give up possession of certain premises in his occupation to the plaintiff. The defendant is a monthly tenant of certain premises in a house belonging to the plaintiff on Hornby Road.

The defendant has pleaded the Rent Act, and denies that the premises in suit are reasonably and bona fide required by the plaintiff for demolishing the same and for erecting a new building.

Now, admittedly the house in which the defendant is a tenant together with the adjoining house is very old. The rooms are dark and badly ventilated; and certainly it would tend to the improvement of the premises, and for the better conditions of the tenants who would occupy the new premises, that the present house should be pulled down and a new house built on the site with all modern conveniences. I cannot see, therefore, that there was anything unreasonable in the plaintiff's conduct in wishing to get the tenants of the present house to vacate in order that proper improvements might be made. It was never intended, as far as I can see, by the Bombay Rent Act that the improvement of old, ill-erected, badly ventilated premises should be entirely stopped until the Rent Act is repealed. All that the Courts have to do in construing section 9 of the Bombay Rent Act is to see that the landlord is acting reasonably. If it was found that the owner of a perfectly new building, built just before the Rent Act came into operation, wanted to pull down that building and build another one, it is quite possible that in these circumstances the Court would think that the landlord was quite unreasonable. In this case we have none of those circumstances. We have two houses which, it is certainly desirable, should be replaced by modern houses. Therefore, if this house was the only house that was mentioned in the case, it seems to me that the plaintiff is entitled to get the defendant to vacate.

But it is argued for the defendant that the plaintiff has another house in which he himself is occupying a room for the purposes of his office, while other rooms are occupied by companies in which the plaintiff is interested and that the plaintiff is really pulling down what I may call the defendant's house in order that he may re-build on the site new offices for himself and his other companies, because the present office building is likely to become unsafe in the near future. The defendant, therefore, suggests that the plaintiff ought to move himself from his present office building to the top floor of the defendant's house and pull down the office building before he pulls down the defendant's building. That, no doubt, would be an alternative. But is there any necessity by which the plaintiff is bound to follow that alternative, which would be convenient to the defendant but would be less convenient for the companies in which the plaintiff is interested and who have rented premises in the office building? Can it be said that the plaintiff is acting unreasonably and not bona fide if he follows the alternative which suits him best? And unless we can hold that in the case of two alternatives the plaintiff must follow one and if he follows the other his conduct is unreasonable, the defendant is bound to fail. I do not see myself how one can pin down the plaintiff to follow one particular alternative when to follow the other is perfectly reasonable; certainly when you look at the plaintiff's ownership of the suit house without considering his ownership of other premises, there would be absolutely nothing unreasonable in his wanting to pull down that house and build another on its site.

In my opinion, therefore, the judgment of the Court below was right, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Contribution, suit for—Joint tort-feasors, liability of, inter se—Conspiracy to make false claim in Court—Contribution, whether recoverable.

The rule that wrong-doers cannot have redress or contribution against each other is confined to cases where the person seeking redress must be presumed to have known that he was doing an unlawful act. [p. 29, col. 2]

Plaintiff and defendant conspired together to make a false claim in a Court of justice and eventually a decree for costs was passed against them which was satisfied by the plaintiff:

Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover contribution from the defendant. [p. 30, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decision of the District Judge, Darbhanga.

Mr. Rajendra Prasad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

COUTTS, J.—This appeal arises out of a contribution suit. The facts are not in dispute and shortly they are that the plaintiff and the defendant jointly brought a suit on a mortgage bond. They obtained a decree in the Court of first instance and this decree was set aside with costs by the High Court in appeal. There was an appeal to the Privy Council in which further costs were incurred, which the plaintiff had also to pay.

In the present suit the plaintiff sought to recover a moiety of these costs. The defendant resisted the suit on two grounds, the first being that he was not really interested in the mortgage bond and the second that the plaintiff was not entitled to contribution because the claim on the mortgage-bond was false and false to the knowledge of both the plaintiff and the defendant. It was found in the Court of first instance that this latter contention was correct but it decreed the suit. On appeal to the District Judge this decision of the Court of First Instance was set aside. Against this decision the plaintiff has appealed.

The only point for consideration is whether on the findings of fact of both the Courts below, that the claim was false to the khowledge of both the plaintiff and the defendant, the defendant is liable or not. The learned District Judge has relied on the principle laid down in the case of Darbhangi Thakur v. Mahabir Prasad (1), decided by a learned Judge of this Court sitting singly, in which it was held that although the suit was false, this would not disentitle the plaintiff to contribution. That suit arose out of certain Batwara proceedings which were instituted before the Collector under the Estates Partition Act. One of the sharers entered an objection which the Collector disallowed and Batwara was ordered to proceed. The objector and one of the other co sharers then instituted a title suit claiming declaration that by reason of a previous partition which still subsisted, the property was not liable to be again partitioned. They impleaded the other co-sharers, some of whom contested the suit and pleaded that there had been no partition. It was found in the Court of first instance that this defence which was raised was not bona fide, because the respondents as well as the appellants knew that the Mouza had been previously partitioned. The suit was accordingly decreed and the defendants were made liable for the costs. The costs were recovered from one of the defendants, who then sued the other defendants for contribution. The suit eventually came on appeal to the High Court and the learned Judge of this Court who first heard the appeal held that even if the plaintiff and the respondent conspired to put forward and maintain a false defence in the previous suit, this would not amount to an actionable wrong for which damages might have been recovered by the plaintiff in that suit, as he would be amply indemnified against such collusive acts by the award of costs. He was of opinion that the rule prohibiting contribution between joint tort-feasors was recognized in India, but as there was no actionable wrong to which the plaintiff and the defendant were parties he refused to allow contribution. In coming to his decision he relied on the case of Merryweather v. Nixan (2).

(1) 41 Ind. Cas. 522.

(2) (1799) 8 T. R. 186; 101 E. R. 1337; 16 R. R. 810; 1 Sm. L. C., 11th Ed., 398.

An appeal from this decision was preferred under the Letters Patent and the decision is reported as Mahabir Prasad v. Darbhangi Thakur (3). The appeal was decided by the Chief Justice and Adami, J. In the course of his judgment the learned Chief Justice remarked: "That the rule of non-contribution between joint tort-feasors exists in India cannot, I think, be questioned, but the authorities appear to show that it ought only to apply in cases where the parties are wrong doers in the sense that they knew or ought to have known that they were doing an illegal or wrongful act, Sreeputty Roy v. Loharam Roy (4)." The decision of the case referred to was based on Adamson v. Jarvis (5), in which the law was laid down by Best, C. J., as follows: "From the inclination of the Court on this last case and from the concluding part of Lord Kenyon's judgment in Merryweather v. Nixan (2) and from reason, justice and sound policy, the rule that wrong-doers cannot have redress or contribution against each other is confined to cases where the person seeking redress must be presumed to have known that he was doing an unlawful act." Applying the law as thus laid down to the case now before us, we find that the plaintiff and the defendant were doing an unlawful act, namely they were making a false claim in a Court of Justice, and we are entitled to presume from the facts which have been found in both the Courts below that they knew that they were doing an unlawful act. In these circumstances there appears to be no doubt that the plaintiff is not entitled to claim contribution.

It has been contended, however, on behalf of the respondent that the case of Adamson v. Jarvis (5) refers only to cases of tort. This was the view which was taken by the learned Judge who first heard the appeal in case of Mahabir Prasad v. Darbhangi Thakur (3) in this Court, but in regard to this the learned Chief Justice in his judgment in Letters Patent appeal said: "Nor are we concerned in any way with the motives which influenced that action. They may have been malicious or they may have been morally unimpeachable, but in neither case would the Court be justified in treating as a tort that which was not legally wrongful. Viewed from this standpoint I agree with the conclusions arrived at by the learned Judge of this Court, although I think he expressed the legal principle upon which he acted in language of too wide import which, if taken as of general application, and, apart from the facts of this case, may be misleading. He says that conspiracy to put forward and maintain a false defence is not a wrong for which law allows a remedy by an action for damages. If this is limited to a defence put forward by the pleadings, I agree with the proposition intended to be laid down, but the word conspiracy does not appear to me to be an apt term for expressing such a case. Indeed the language used might lead to the conclusion that it was not a wrongful act to conspire together to commit perjury in support of a defence known to be unsupportable, which would in itself be a crime."

In the present case the plaintiff and the defendant conspired together not to commit perjury but to make a false claim in a Court of Justice, which is a crime. I agree with the view of the law expressed by the learned Chief Justice and applying it to the present case, the plaintiff clearly is not entitled to contribution. I would accordingly set aside the decision of the District Judge and would decree this appeal with costs.

SULTAN AHMED, J.—I agree.

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Amraoti, dated 21st September 1918, in Civil Appeal No. 121 of 1918.

Mr. S. Ramdas, for the Appellant.

Messrs. V. V. Chitale and Y. G. Deshpande, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff sues the heirs and legal representatives of one Kisan on the allegation that Kisan had dealings with the plaintiff and acknowledged the sum of Rs. 2,444 7-3 in a ruzu khata. There were some petty items subsequently advanced and also some re-payments. The plaintiff, therefore, sues for Rs. 2,555-2-0. An inspection of the plaintiff's account-books showed that many of the items charged were interest upon a mortgage executed by Kisan on 15th December 1909. This was a mortgage by conditional sale carrying simple interest at Rs. 1-8-0 per cent. per mensem. The mortgage further provided that, in the case of default in payment, interest at Rs. 2 per cent. per mensem was payable. The whole mortgage-money became payable in 1911. The plaintiff stated that, if the amount included in the claim on account of interest on the mortgage-deed were taken away together with interest charged thereon, there would be nothing for him to recover in this suit.

In Berar the rule of damdupat is enforced. This is an obvious attempt to evade the rule. The plaintiff has not only charged interest at Rs. 1-8-0 per cent. per mensem but has charged compound interest not allowed by the mortgage deed. Both the Courts below have dismissed the suit on the authority of Kannu v. Natesa (1). That case, however, is not applicable, for the plaintiff is not suing for a mortgage decree in respect of interest but is only suing for a simple money decree. The decision of the lower Courts can be supported on another ground. The mortgage was one by conditional sale and there is no personal covenant to pay. So far as the mortgage is concerned, the plaintiff has no right to sue for a simple money-decree in respect of the interest. I have already pointed out that the mortgage does not entitle the plaintiff to claim compound interest.

In Shankar v. Mukta (2) it has been held that the mere existence of a ruzu khata is not, unsupported by evidence of a contemporaneous oral agreement founded on consideration, sufficient to form the basis of a fresh contract. It is merely an acknowledgment of the correctness of the account: see Bechar Raghubir Singh v. Udechand (3) and Durga Shankar v. Ram Prasad (4). Oral evidence was not admissible to vary the terms of the registered mortgage deed. Hence as the acknowledgment is not in itself a promise to pay, the plaintiff is not entitled to give evidence varying the terms of the mortgage-deed. That mortgage did not entitle him to claim a money-decree for the mortgage-debt.

It is, however, ingeniously argued that the interest was a debt due under the mortgage and that the plaintiff is entitled to appropriate the re-payments made towards his debt. The first objection is that compound interest was not a debt under the mortgage and the second is that the plaintiff has not made any such appropriation in his account-books nor in the plaint, nor did he raise this point in the Courts below. It is now too late in this second appeal to claim to make an appropriation not already made. If this point had been raised in the Courts below, it would have been open to the defendants to say that the payment was made under the circumstances implying that the payment was to be applied to the discharge of the ordinary miscellaneous dealings and not to the mortgage-debt. In this view it is unnecessary to discuss the question raised whether a debt under section 59 of the Indian Contract Act includes a debt which cannot, at any time, be personally recovered from the debtor.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.

SULTAN AHMED, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit which was instituted by the plaintiffs against the defendants for contribution with respect to costs paid by them in execution of a decree. It appears that on the 2nd January 1900 the plaintiffs and the defendants purchased certain property at a revenue sale. In 1901 certain proprietors, Nand Kumar Singh and others, brought a suit to set aside this revenue sale. In 1905 the suit was decreed, but an appeal was preferred to the High Court which confirmed the decree of the trial Court in 1907. Against the decree of the High Court the plaintiff and the respondents in this suit secured leave to appeal to the Privy Council. Their Lordships of the Privy Council also dismissed their appeal on the 11th February 1913. The other proprietors, Ajnash Lal and others, in the meanwhile brought a suit in 1912 for recovery of possession of their share and in that suit decree for costs was passed against both the plaintiffs and the defend ants. The decree was, however, executed against the plantiffs only, who paid off the same and then brought the suit for contribution. The trial Court held that the plaintiffs were entitled to a decree. An appeal having been preferred, the learned Subordinate Judge on the other hand came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs could not have been under the bona fide belief that they were in lawful possession of the property when in 1912 Ajnash Lal and others brought their suit. It must be borne in mind that the plaintiffs' and the defendants' possession over the property in the suit was confirmed by the Commissioner some time in 1901 and since then they were in possession of the property. The law of non-contribution between wrong doers has been very lucidly enunciated in the case of Mahabir Prasad v. Darbhangi Thakur (1), where following the case of Sreeputty Roy v. Laharam Roy (2) it has been laid down that the rule of non contribution between joint tort-feasors ought only to apply to cases where the parties are wrong-doers in the sense that they knew or ought to have known that they were doing an illegal or wrongful act. In other words, the plaintiffs' suit must succeed unless it is proved that the plaintiffs and the defendants were in illegal or wrongful possession of the property. In my opinion it is idle to suggest that they were doing an illegal or a wrongful act when they prosecuted their suit up to the Privy Council. How can it be contended that they were in wrongful or illegal possession of the property, when as a matter of fact their possession had been confirmed by the Commissioner and they had got leave to appeal to the Privy Council against the decision of the High Court? In my opinion the learned Subordinate Judge has clearly erred in holding that when Ajnash and others brought their suit in 1912, the plaintiffs and the defendants should have quietly made over the possession of the property to them, though at that time they were prosecuting the appeal in the Privy Council.

I am clearly of opinion that the plaintiffs and the respondents were not wrong doers and that they were not in any illegal or wrongful possession of the property up till the disposal of their appeal by the Privy Council.

The result is that this appeal is allowed, the decree of the lower Appellate Court is set aside and the decision of the Court of first instance is restored.

The appellants are entitled to their costs.

There is no presumption that property in the possession of a Hindu widow acquired after her husband's death is either her absolute property or that she has only a widow's interest in it. It rests on the person who alleges that she has an absolute interest to prove that allegation. [p. 43, col. 1.]

Mr. V. D. Sathaye, for the Appellant.

Mr. J. C. Ghosh, R B. N. G. Sarkar and Dr. H. S. Gour, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of the case are sufficiently given in the judgment of the lower Appellate Court and need not be repeated. It is the story of both sides that the house in dispute belongs to Musammat Subhran and that defendants Nos. 1 and 4 are the sons of her daughter. It is also admitted that the woman conveyed the house by a deed of gift to the plaintiff Kaliram on the 25th November 1908, though she continued to reside therein till her death in 19 0. It is urged, on the authority of Dakhina Kali Debi v. Jagadishwar Bhuttacharjee (1), that there is no presumption to show that property in possession of a Hindu widow acquired after her husband's death is absolute property, or that she has only a widow's interest in it. There is no presumption either way and, therefore, in these cases, it rests on the person who states that a widow has an absolute interest in any immoveable property to prove that she has it. In the present case that person would be the plaintiff, for he comes into Court stating that the house in suit was gifted to him by Musammat Subhran and she had a right to gift it.

It is argued for the appellant that, in the pleadings in the case, the question of Musammat Subhran's interest in the house was not sufficiently gone into, and that order should have been clearly put in issue. Defendant No. 1 in his written statement stated "that even if the gift was made, as alleged, it is not binding on this defendant, as Musammat Subhran had no power to gift away any property absolutely, and this defendant as her next reversioner is not bound by it."

Defendant No. 2, in parapraph 2 of his written statement, stated that "this defendant purchased the same under a bona fide belief that the said defendant No. 1 had a right to sell the same, inasmuch as the said Musammat Subhran had only a widow's interest in the house." The plaintiff in reply stated,—

"the house originally belonged to Sakharam who had kept Musammat Subhran as his mistress, I don't know how Subhran got the house."

The following two issues were framed on these pleadings :—

"3. Was Musammat Subhran competent to make a gift, and is it binding on defendants Nos, 1 and 4?

4. Are the defendants Nos. 1 and 4 reversioners of Musammat Subhran? If so, are they entitled to retain possession of the house after the death of Musammat Subhran?"

It could, therefore, hardly be said that plaintiff had no notice that to establish his suit he should have to prove that Musammat Subhran had the power to gift him the house.

For the respondents it is contended that, this being the case, and plaintiff having failed to call evidence on the point, his suit has been rightly dismissed. It seems to me that this view is correct. There is no evidence on record to show that Musammat Subhran got the house from her paramour as a gift. There is the judgment in a previous case, but that, by itself, does not establish the plaintiff's claim, for it no where specifically finds that the house came to the woman from Sakharam. It is a mere question of evidence and I do not think it should be justified in sending the case back for giving plaintiff another opportunity of proving what it was his duty to establish during the trial. On the record as it stands, he has clearly failed to show that the gift by Musammat Subhran binds her reversioners. This being so, this appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.

SULTAN AHMED, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit for recovery of a sum of Rs 2,300, principal and interest, due on a mortgage-bond, by sale of the mortgaged property.

The plaintiff's case was that the property in that suit was mortgaged in 1901 by one Ram Prasad (whose representatives-in-interest in the present suit are defendants Nos. 4 to 6) to defendant No. 7, who, however, admittedly was only a benamdar of the plaintiffs. The agreement in the mortgage-bond was that the mortgagee was to remain in possession for eight years in lieu of interest, if he ceased to have possession, the mortgagor was to pay interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per month. The mortgagee was also given the right to bring the property to sale if the mortgage-money was not re-paid. In 1906 Ram Prasad executed another mortgage—a simple mortgage-bond—in respect of the same and other properties in favour of the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3, who are Marwaris. In 1910 the Marwaris sued on their mortgage-bond making the present plaintiffs parties. They obtained a decree and, in execution, the property was sold and purchased by them. The plaintiffs brought the present suit on their mortgage-bond of 1901. The suit, which was contested by the Marwari defendants, was partly decreed, and against this decree both the plaintiffs and Marwaris appealed to the District Judge.

Both the appeals were unsuccessful except that the rate of interest was modified. The Marwari defendants have now appealed to this Court.

The first question which arises in this appeal is, whether the suit is barred by the principle of res judicata. The facts are, that the Marwaris in their suit in 1910 made the present plaintiffs defendants (they were defendants Nos. 6 and 7 in that suit) and they actually appeared and set up their prior mortgage. No definite issue seems to have been raised in this suit as to whether they were or were not prior mortgagees, but the Deputy Commissioner, Subordinate Judge, in his judgment said,—"No order is passed as regards the claim of defendants Nos. 6 and 7 because they have failed to prove their prior mortgage. The question of res judicata has been discussed by the learned Subordinate Judge in the lower Court and he appears to have considered that, because no formal issue on the question of whether the defendants Nos. 6 and 7, the present plaintiffs, were or were not prior mortgagees, was framed, the Deputy Commissioner, Subordinate Judge, cannot have come, and did not come, to any decision which would operate as res judicata.

The question which has, therefore, to be considered in this appeal is, whether the suit is barred by the principle of res judicata. It is absolutely clear that a paramount title cannot be drawn into controversy in an action for foreclosure. The prior mortgagee is not, therefore, a necessary party to an action by a puisne mortgagee for foreclosure, the chief object of which is only to cut off all rights subsequent to the mortgage and not prior to the mortgage. There was some doubt about the necessity of a prior mortgagee being made a party in a suit by a subsequent mortgagee; but all that doubt has been set at rest by Order XXXIV, rule 1 of the present Code of Civil Procedure. At the same time, the puisne mortgagee may make a prior mortgagee a party to the suit. If he does so, the purpose of making the prior mortgagee a party should be clearly stated; but, if no purpose is given in the plaint or provided for in the decree, the prior mortgage will not be affected by the judgment in any way. Where no relief is claimed, the subject-matter of the action is the interest of the mortgagor minus the interest of the first mortgagee, and in such a suit, in my opinion, no investigation as to the validity or extent of the prior mortgage can possibly be made.

The whole question has been very lucidly discussed in "Jones on Mortgage," Volume 2, paragraph 1439, as follows:—

LACHMI NARAYAN MARWARI v. BHAGWAT SINGH.

"Persons having interests in the property, paramount to the mortgage sought to be foreclosed, are generally neither necessary nor proper parties to the suit, because the only proper object of the proceedings is to bar all rights subsequent to the mortgage. The decree can have no effect upon the rights of parties having priority, whether they are made parties to the action or not.

"In some cases prior mortgagees are made parties to the bill, so that the Court may, with their consent, order a sale of the whole estate and thus make a good and complete title in the purchaser. Sometimes, a prior mortgagee is made a party to the suit, with a view to his assenting to a decree for the sale of the whole estate, in which case his mortgage is first paid, and the proceeds then applied to the second mortgage. In such case, the legal presumption is that a purchaser at a foreclosure sale gives the full value of the property, and the whole proceeds of the property are then applied to the payment of the incumbrances in the order of their priorities. But it is proper to make the person who holds the prior legal title a party only when his debt is payable and he is willing to receive payment and for the purpose of making a sale of the whole title. He is not a necessary party except for such a decree. The Court may order a sale subject to a prior incumbrance, and, unless the mortgagee with paramount title expressly consents to a sale of the mortgaged estate, the sale must be made subject to his mortgage; and no portion of the proceeds of the same can be applied in payment thereof.

"When a prior incumbrancer is made a party to a foreclosure suit, there should be an allegation of the purpose for which he is made a party; as, for instance, that the amount of his mortgage may be ascertained and determined by the judgment of the Court, so that the mortgage can be paid out of the proceeds of the sale, or so, that the sale may be subject to the known amount of the lien. If such purpose is not indicated in the complaint, nor provided for in the judgment, the prior incumbrancer will not be affected by the judgment".

An examination of the case law on the subject also leads to the same conclusion. In the case of Sri Gopal v. Pirthi Singh (1), in the previous suit, the plaintiffs claimed priority over the prior mortgagees and claimed relief against them. The head-note* of this decision is misleading, and gives one the impression that their Lordships of the Privy Council laid down, generally, that whenever the prior mortgagee of the same property is made a party to a suit he must set up his prior mortgage, and if he omits to set up his prior charge, the suit subsequently brought by him will be barred. A reference to the judgment of Sir Alfred North will show that no such wide proposition of law was laid down and that relief was claimed against the prior mortgagee. In the case of Gopal Lal v. Benarsi Perhsad Chowdhury (2) the subsequent mortgagee had impleaded the prior mortgagees and had claimed to sell the property free from all incumbrances. Mahomed Ibrahim Hossein Khan v. Ambika Pershad Singh (3) and Mahabir Pershad Singh v. Prabhu Singh (4) are also cases where relief having been claimed against the prior mortgagee and he having failed to set up the prior mortgage, it was held that subsequent suit by him was barred.

The decisions in Surjiram Marwari v. Barhamdeo Pershad (5), Dhapi v. Barham Deo Pershad (6) and Mahabir Pershad v. Prabhu Singh (4) are clear authorities for the view that, unless relief is claimed against the prior mortgagee, the latter need not set up his prior mortgage. There is, however, the decision in the case of Gajadhar v. Bhagwanta (7) where it was held that, once the prior mortgagee is made a party, he must set up his mortgage even if no relief is claimed against him. The decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Mahomed Ibrahim Hossein Khan v. Ambika Pershad Singh (3) on which the Hon'ble Judges of the Allahabad High Court took this view does not, however, lay down any such wide proposition. It will appear from the judgment of Sir John Edge, at page 441*, that property in the previous suit was sold free from all charges and incumbrances. Taking the decision in Gojadhar v. Bhagwanta (7) as the limit to which the Courts would go, it would mean that the prior mortgagee would be bound to disclose his prior mortgage in the previous suit if he is made a party. This, admittedly, had been done by the plaintiffs who set up their prior mortgage in the previous suit. Therefore, the suit is clearly not barred under section 11, Explanation IV, by reason of any omission, nor is the suit barred under section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure itself. Inasmuch as the subject-matter of the present suit is totally different from the subject matter of the previous suit, there could be no decision in the previous suit with respect to the prior mortgage, nor indeed there has been any such decision. The learned, Deputy Commissioner, Subordinate Judge, in his judgment in the previous suit said:—"No order is passed as regards the claim of the defendants Nos. 6 and 7, because they have failed to prove their prior mortgage". On the face of this order, it is impossible to contend that there had been any decision. Therefore, in any view of the case, the doctrine of res judicata in my opinion is inapplicable. I would, therefore, dismiss this appeal with costs.

RAMDIN AND ANOTHER—DEFENDANTS—APPELLANTS

KESHAO PRASAD—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT

Landlord and tenant—Tenant, whether can be made without landlord's knowledge—Benami tenant, whether recognised by law.

A person cannot be made a tenant without the landlord's knowledge, and no third person can set up a person as tenant who admittedly was not made a tenant by the landlord. There is no such status known to the tenancy law as a benami tenant. [p 37, col. 2.]

Appeal from the decree of the Additional District Judge, Saugor, in Civil Appeal No. 40 of 1918, dated the 30th April 1918.

FACTS appear from the following judgment of the Appellate Court:—

Plaintiff-appellant brought this suit in the Court of the Munsif, Rehli, for recovering mesne profits, in the sum of Rs. 140, in respect of field No. 58, area 31·06 rent for Rs. 60 of Mouza Dhikuwa, alleging that he is the ordinary tenant of the land, that he let it out to defendant No. 1 in 1971 Sambat and 1972 Sambat and recovered rent of those years by a suit from him and that defendants Nos. 1 and 2 wrongfully took it into their possession in 1973 Sambat and enjoyed the crop of that year, and that they were thus trespassers in respect of it during that year and that the letting value of the field in Sambat 1973 was Rs. 140.

Defendant admits that plaintiff obtained a decree for rent against defendant No. 1 in respect of the years 1971 and 1972 Sambat, from the Court of the Additional Munsif, but alleges that the decision in that suit as regards plaintiff's tenancy does not operate as res judicata for the purposes of this suit, and then pleads that plaintiff is not the tenant of this land, that one Musammat Sahodrabai is the tenant and plaintiff's name as an ordinary tenant of this land was got recorded by Musammat Sahodrabai only nominally, that plaintiff cannot recover more rent than what he recovered in respect of the years 1971 and 1972 Sambat.

The lower Court found, on the strength of defendant's oral evidence, that Musammat Sahodrabai and not the plaintiff was the tenant of this land and that plaintiff could not maintain the suit; that the decision in the previous suit did not prevent the defendant from alleging that plaintiff was not the tenant, and that the rental value of the land in 1973 Sambat was Rs. 140. Ultimately, it dismissed the suit on the ground that plaintiff had no title to the land.

I agree with the lower Court in its finding that the decision in the previous Suit No. 171 of 1916 does not operate as res judicata and does not estop other defendants from denying plaintiff's title to the land. It was not necessary to decide the question of title in that suit, and the only question was if defendant No. 1 took the land on lease during 1971 Sambat and 1972 Sambat from the plaintiff. It was not essential to determine how the plaintiff derived his title to let the land.

The next question is, if plaintiff-appellant is a tenant of the land. The patta granted by the settlement is not filed by the plaintiff but the defendants admit that land is recorded in settlement papers in appellant's name but Sahodrabai who is examined as D. W. No. 7 also admits that the receipts for rent are passed by the Court of Wards in plaintiff's name. The only question then is, if plaintiff is a nominal tenant. The contract of tenancy is personal and Musammat Sahodrabai tells us that it was ordered that she could not hold more than 100 acres of land for her maintenance and so she devised this plan of getting the land recorded in plaintiff's name and enjoying it herself. Thus, she admits that the Deputy Commissioner did not know that she was the tenant but they granted the land to the plaintiff. D. W. No. 1 admits that the land was let by the Deputy Commissioner. The Manager, Court of Wards, has no authority to let out land and D. W. No. 2 does not say that he let it. The Court of Wards were the Malguzar and they recognized the plaintiff as their tenant and not Musammat Sahodrabai. Even D. W. No. 2 admits that he accepted rent from the plaintiff after he had once refused to take it on the ground that plaintiff was not the tenant. The defendants' evidence is thus useless to disprove the plaintiff's tenancy. I hold that the contract took place between the Court of Wards and the plaintiff and Musammat Sahodrabai cannot take advantage of her clandestine act and such a thing would be against the public policy and spirit of the tenancy law. The Court of Wards never intended to let the land to Musammat Sahodrabai on her admission, so I hold that plaintiff is the tenant of the land.

The lower Court has found that in 1973 Sambat the letting value of the land was Rs. 140. I do not see any reason to differ from it, in respect of that finding.

I would allow this appeal, set aside the decree of the lower Court and order a decree to be issued against the respondents for Rs. 140 and costs The respondents to bear appellant's costs of both the Courts.

Mr. G. V. Deshmukh, for the Appellants.

Mr. M. Gupta, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—A person cannot be made a tenant without the landlord's knowledge, and no third person can set up as tenant, a person who admittedly was not made tenant by the landlord. There is no such status known to the tenancy law as a benami tenant. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.

SULTAN AHMED, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit instituted by the plaintiffs for a declaration of their title to, as also for recovery of possession with mesne profits of, a certain dar-mokarrari tenure. The material facts are, that one Toral Narayan Singh, the father of defendants Nos. 3 to 6, held two separate dar mokarrari tenures in Mouza Nasrathpur Phulwaria, one under the plaintiffs and the other under the original defendant No. 2, Abdul Wahab, the respondents Nos. 2, 2*a*, 2*b* being his reprentatives on his death.

Toral Narayan having died, his four sons were sued for arrears of rent and the plaintiffs-appellants got a rent-decree against them on the 16th July 1912 in respect of the dar-mokarrari tenure held under them. In execution of the rent-decree, they brought about the sale of the defaulting tenure and it was purchased by them. But the entire decretal amount could not be realised from the sale and over Rs. 1,000 remained still due. The plaintiffs then obtained another rent-decree dated the 22nd August 1913 for the subsequent arrears of rent against the four sons of Toral Narayan Singh. In execution of this, as also of the former unsatisfied decree, the plaintiff brought about the sale of the dar-mokarrari tenure held under Abdul Wahab, and it was purchased by them on the 22nd March 1915. In execution of the sale certificate, they obtained formal delivery of possession through the Court on the 28th May 1915. Abdul Wahab, defendant No. 2, also brought a rent suit against Kali Prasad, Baijnath and Inder Narayan, sons of Toral, for arrears of rent in respect of the dar-mokarrari tenure held under him obtained a decree on the 6th April 1914. In execution of this decree, he brought about the sale of the defaulting tenure, and it was purchased by Bindesri Prasad, defendant-respondent No. 1, on the 27th April 1915. The defendant No. 1 in execution of his sale certificate obtained delivery of possession through the Court on the 16th June 1915, and, since then, he has been in actual possession of the tenure in suit. The plaintiffs thereupon applied under Order XXI, rule 100, for being put in possession of the same. Their application was dismissed on the 11th September 1913. Then, on the 22nd April 1917, the plaintiffs instituted the present suit for a declaration of their title by virtue of their prior purchase, as also for recovery of possession with mesne profits. The suit was contested by defendant No. 1 alone. The trial Court held that the suit was barred by limitation under Article 11 of the Limitation Act. The Appellate Court also came to the same conclusion ; hence this second appeal. The main point for consideration is, whether the suit was barred by limitation. It appears that on the 11th September 1915 the appellant did not adduce any evidence and the Court passed the following order :—

"Applicant again applies for time. It is highly frivolous and is, therefore, rejected. Applicant takes no step to adduce evidence, other side is ready, ordered that the application is struck off for default with costs and Pleaders' fee Rs. 4."

The learned Vakil appearing on behalf of the appellant contends that Article 11 of the Limitation Act does not apply to an order of the kind such as we find in this case. Order XXI, rule 100 runs as follows :—"Where any person, other than the judgment-debtor, is dispossessed of immoveable property by the holder of a decree for the possession of such property or where such property has been sold in execution of a decree, by the purchaser thereof, he may make an application to the Court complaining of such dispossession. The Court shall fix a day for investigating the matter, and shall summon the party against whom the application is made to appear and answer the same". Under Article 11 the suit must be brought within one year from the date of an order under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, on a claim preferred to or an objection made to the attachment of the property attached in execution of a decree. There can be no doubt that Article 11 of the Limitation Act is sufficiently wide to cover cases brought under Order XXI, rule 103 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But it is contended by the learned Vakil appearing on behalf of the appellant that Article 11 has no application where there has been no investigation of the claim as to the merits, and it is urged that as the order of the 11th September 1913 was an order on default without any investigation of the claims of the parties. Article 11 did not apply. I regret I cannot accept this contention as sound. It must be remembered, as was observed by Lord Hobhouse in the case of Sardhari Lal v. Ambika Pershad (1), that "the order," that is, the order in the claim case to which he was referring, "was made and it was an order within the jurisdiction of the Court that made it. It is not conclusive and a suit may be brought to claim the property notwithstanding the order. But then the law of limitation says that the plaintiff must be prompt in bringing his suit. The policy of the Act evidently is to secure the speedy settlement of questions of title raised at execution sales and for that reason a year is fixed as time within which the suit must be brought".

The policy their Lordships were referring to was the policy of the law under the Civil Procedure Code and the Limitation Act of 1877, and it is still the policy under the present Code and the Limitation Act. It must be remembered that the language of Article 11 of the present Limitation Act is more general than that of the Act of 1877. Even under the Limitation Act of 1877 there was great divergence of judicial opinion on the question whether an order rejecting a claim made without investigation came within Article 11 or not. In my opinion, Article 11 of the Act of 1908 is much more comprehensive than Article 11 of the preceding Act, and there seems to be no justification to restrict the operation of the Article only to those cases where investigation has taken place.

The view that I take of the matter is supported by the decisions in Nogendra Lal Chowdhury v. Fani Bhusan Das (2) and Machi Raju Venkataratnam v. Sri Rajah Vadrevu Ranganayakamma (3), and Gokul v. Mohri Bibi (4). The result, therefore, is that, in my opinion, the suit was clearly barred under Article 11 of the Limitation Act.

Certain mortgaged property was sold by the mortgagee to a stranger under the mistaken belief that he was the owner of the property. Ten years afterwards, the property was re-purchased by the mortgagee. In a suit for redemption of the property by the mortgagor:

Held, that the defendant must be deemed to be in possession of the property not as the representative of the purchaser but as mortgagee and that the suit was not, therefore, barred by time.

Mr. K. H. Kelkar, for the Appellant.

Mr. G. S. Rao, for Respondent No. 1.

JUDGMENT.—This suit was originally filed in 1910 by the plaintiffs who sued for redemption of a mortgage dated 10th April 1885. The suit was dismissed in the trial Court. On appeal the case was remanded, and again on appeal from the order of remand it was held by the High Court that the one plaintiff, Shivba, had no right to redeem, and the suit would have to be dismissed as his interest in the equity of redemption had been sold. As regards the other plaintiff who represented Devba, the other mortgagor, the Court decided that he should be allowed an opportunity of redeeming the outstanding mortgage. The case, therefore, went back to the Subordinate Judge who directed that the plaintiffs should recover from the defendants possession of the properties in suit with the exception of Survey Nos. 54 and 87 of Bharadi and Survey No. 11 of Sarve free from the mortgage This decree was upheld on appeal except that it was modified by substituting the word "plaintiff No. 2" for the "plaintiffs". The second plaintiff, Kalu Devba, has now appealed against that part of the decision of the Assistant Judge which decided that he should not be entitled to recover Survey Nos. 54 and 87 of Bharadi and Survey No. 11 of Sarve.

With regard to Survey No. 11, that is now in the possession of an outsider, having been sold at a Court sale, all that the second plaintiff would be entitled to would be compensation from that mortgagee on the ground that when redemption was sought the mortgagee could not produce the property mortgaged. Both the lower Courts have come to the conclusion that compensation should not be allowed, and we agree with the reasons given in the judgment of the learned Assistant Judge.

But with regard to Survey Nos. 54 and 87, they stand on an entirely different footing as they are in the possession of the first defendant as representative of the original mortgagee. The original mortgagee purchased, as he thought, the equity of redemption of both the mortgagors at a Court sale. Then he sold the property to two outsiders, and, after the period of six and ten years, respectively, bought back those properties from the persons to whom he had sold them. He now resists the plaintiffs' claim to redeem on the ground that he is in possession, not as mortgagee, but as purchaser, and the plaintiff's claim to redeem is barred under Article 134 of the Indian Limitation Act if he could show that the suit to redeem has been brought more than twelve years after the original transfer. But the fallacy in that argument lies in this, that the defendant was responsible for the original mistake. He ought to have seen that he had only bought the equity of redemption of one of the mortgagors, and he cannot derive any benefit from his negligence by purporting to sell the whole of the property to third parties, and then purporting to obtain a good title by re purchasing those properties from those parties. In my opinion the original mistake is revived by the properties coming back into the possession of the defendant, and he must be treated now as a mortgagee and not as an innocent transferee without notice. Therefore, I think the original decree must be modified by directing that the second plaintiff should recover from the defendant possession of the properties in suit with the exception of Survey No 11 of Sarve free from the mortgage. With regard to the successful appellant he pays his own costs up to the 13th November 1916 when the Subordinate Judge gave the judgment, and he will get his costs in this Court and in the first Appeal Court from the defendants.

Decree modified.

Execution of decree—Assignment of mortgage decree, whether includes personal decree subsequently obtained—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 14—Assignee of mortgage decree, application by, for execution of decree—Dismissal of application under misapprehension that personal decree had not been obtained—Exclusion of time spent in prosecuting application, whether can be claimed—Good faith—Jurisdiction, want of.

The assignment of an original mortgage decree must be taken to include the assignment of a decree subsequently obtained under Order XXXIV, rule 6 of the Civil Procedure Code even if the latter decree is not expressly mentioned in the deed of assignment. [p 41, col. 2.]

A mortgagee obtained a decree on foot of his mortgage and brought the mortgaged property to sale in execution of the decree. The decree was, however, not satisfied by the sale of the property, so the decree-holder obtained a money decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6 of the Civil Procedure Code. Subsequently, he assigned the decree to one M. whose application for execution was dismissed on the ground that no decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6 had been obtained. On appeal to the High Court the mistake was discovered but a subsequent application for execution of the personal decree was objected to on the ground that it was barred by time:

Held, that the decree-holder was entitled under section 14 of the Limitation Act to exclude the time spent in prosecuting the first application for execution and that, therefore, the second application was within time. [p. 42, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

COUTTS, J.—This is an appeal by the judgment-debtor against an order of the Subordinate Judge of Gaya, allowing an execution to proceed.

It appears that the judgment-debtor mortgaged certain property to one Mahangi Lal. Mahangi sued on his mortgage and on the 18th of June 1912 he obtained a decree on compromise. On the 5th of July 1913, he filed the first application for execution. The mortgaged property was sold and an application to set aside the sale was rejected on the 20th of June 1914. The decree was not satisfied by the sale of the mortgaged property, so the decree-holder on the 9th of July 1915 obtained a money decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6. Subsequently, on the 29th of November 1915, Mahangi assigned his decree to Mirza Mohammad Raza and others by a kabala. On the 18th of June 1917, the assignees applied for execution of the mortgage decree of the 18th of June 1912 against properties other than the mortgaged properties of the judgment debtor. The application was opposed, principally, on the ground that the mortgaged property having been sold and there being no decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6, the execution could not proceed. The Subordinate Judge overruled the objection on the ground that the original decree being on compromise no decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6 was necessary. On appeal to the High Court, however, this decision of the Subordinate Judge was set aside and it was held that a decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6 was necessary. Accordingly, an application for such a decree was made but on the original records being sent for and the papers examined the decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6, which had been obtained by Mahangi Lal on the 9th of July 1915, was discovered. On the 20th of May 1919 an application for execution of this decree was made by the assignees but the application was opposed as being time-barred. The learned Subordinate Judge has, however, found that under section 14 of the Limitation Act the assignees were entitled to exclude the period from the date of their application for execution (18th of June 1919) to the date of the finding of the decree under Order XXXIV, rule 16, (10th of March 1919). The judgment-debtor has appealed.

It is first of all contended that the present applicants for execution are not assignees of the decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6, which was obtained by Mahangi Lal and, consequently, they cannot execute that decree. We have not got the kabala by which the assignment was made but as the assignees did not apply to execute the decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6 we may take it that this decree was not mentioned in the kabala. On the other hand, it is contended on behalf of the assignees that what was assigned was the rights under the original decree of the 18th of June 1912 and that one of these rights arising under the original decree was the right to execute the decree against the other property of the judgment-debtor. This right exists irrespective of any decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6, which is merely a form of procedure, so that when the rights under the original decree were assigned they included also the decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6.

The question is not free from difficulty but, in my opinion, the assignment of the original decree must be taken to include the assignment of a decree subsequently obtained under Order XXXIV, rule 6, even if that decree is not expressly mentioned in the deed of assignment. If this were not so, there would, in such a case, be no assignment of anything because the assignees could not execute the original decree and they could not get a decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6, as a decree under that rule had already been passed. It must be, then, that when the assignment of the original decree was made, it included also an assignment of the decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6.

The next point for consideration is, whether the assignees are entitled, under section 14 of the Limitation Act, to exclude the period between the first application for execution dated the 18th of June 1917 and the date of the discovery of the decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6, namely, the 10th of March 1919. In order to get the benefit of this period they must show that during this time they were prosecuting the first application with due diligence and in good faith in a Court which, from defect of jurisdiction or other cause of a like nature, was unable to entertain it. In the first place, it is contended that there was neither due diligence nor good faith. "Good faith" has been defined in the Limitation Act as follows: "Nothing shall be deemed to be done in good faith which is not done with due care and attention," and the contention of the learned Vakil for the appellant is that if the assignees had taken the trouble to look at the record they would have discovered that there was a decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6 and, not having done so, they did not act with due diligence or due care and attention. I am unable to accept this argument. The assignor apparently said nothing about the decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6 and there was nothing to lead the assignees to suspect that there was such a decree; nor did either they or the executing Court think that such a decree was necessary and it was not until the matter went up to the High Court that the necessity for the decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6 was discovered. Moreover, the assignees were completely misled by the objection which was taken by the judgment-debtor that the proceedings must fail by reason of there being no decree under Order XXXIV, rule 6, although the judgment-debtor must have known perfectly well that there was such a decree in existence. Under these circumstances, I agree with the learned Subordinate Judge that there was no want of diligence or good faith on the part of the assignees and, so far as this matter is concerned, they are entitled to the benefit of section 14 of the Limitation Act.

There remains, however, the question whether there was want of jurisdiction in the Court in which the application for execution of the original decree was being prosecuted. It seems to me that on this point there can be no doubt. The High Court held that the decree was not capable of execution at all. Consequently, it must be held that the executing Court was acting without jurisdiction in entertaining the application for execution and the assignees were prosecuting their first application in a Court which from defect of jurisdiction was unable to entertain it.

In these circumstances, I agree with the learned Subordinate Judge that the assignees are entitled to the benefit of section 14 of the Limitation Act. I would accordingly dismiss this appeal with costs.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Arts. 123, 144—Heirs of Muhammadan holding as tenants-in-common—Suit by one heir for his share—Limitation applicable.

Where on the death of a Muhammadan his heirs continue to hold the estate as tenants-in-common, a suit by one of them for partition of his share is governed by Article 144 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act and time begins to run against the plaintiff from the moment when the other co-heirs of the deceased do some act the effect of which is either to exclude the plaintiff from the joint property or to deny his right to share. [p. 43, col. 1.]

First appeal from the decision of the Assistant Judge, Dharwar, in Suit No. 30 of 1917.

Mr. Nilkant Atmaram, for the Appellant.

Mr. R. A. Jahagirdar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT,

MACLEOD, C. J.—Defendant No. 1's husband and defendant No. 3 were entitled to succeed to their father's property according to Muhammadan Law. The defendant No. 3 mortgaged his share, or the property representing his share, to the plaintiffs, and eventually sold the equity of redemption to them. The plaintiffs, therefore, are entitled to the share in the estate to which defendant No. 3 was entitled. They are endeavouring now to get possession of that share by partition. They are being resisted by the second defendant who is a tenant of the first defendant. The lower Court dismissed the suit on the ground that it was barred by limitation. The learned Judge seems to have thought that Article 123 applied, with this startling result. Supposing the heirs of a deceased Muhammadan chose to live in community, as is certainly often done in Bombay, and even more often up-country, for several generations, the rights of each of the sharers to a partition would be barred twelve years after the death of the original head of the family. We do not think that that can be the case. We do not think that Article 123 can apply to the facts of this case where two Muhammadans continued to own as tenants-in-common an estate of their deceased father. The ordinary law would apply that time would begin to run against one tenant-in common when the other tenant in-common did some act the effect of which was either to exclude his co tenant from the joint property, or to deny his right to share. It may then be said that time begins to run from the date of such exclusion or denial, and the Article which would be applicable would be 144. It was admitted that, even if time began to run in 1905, the suit, which was originally filed on the 15th October 1915, will be in time. I think, therefore, that the decree of the lower Court must be set aside and a preliminary decree for partition should be passed. The plaintiffs will be entitled to the costs of the appeal.

HEATON, J.—It is contended that this suit falls under Article 123 of the Schedule to the Indian Limitation Act. If it does, then no doubt the suit is time-barred. If it does not, then it is not shown that the suit is time-barred, and there is every reason to suppose that it is not. In my opinion, Article 123 does not apply. The present suit is certainly not in terms a suit for a distributive share of the property of an intestate. It is in terms a suit to have partitioned property which two persons are holding in common and to have the partition made so that each of these two persons shall be allotted his proper share. The suit is not based on the circumstance of anybody's intestacy, or of rights immediately arising out of an intestacy, so I think that in substance also the suit does not come under Article 123. We have here the very common case of Muhammadans who succeed to the property of a deceased relative, and by agreement amongst themselves instead of distributing that property by shares, hold it in common. They are entitled under our law to do this. They are not under an obligation to at once divide the property according to their shares. They can hold, and continue to hold, it in common, and having done so they hold it under an agreement. They can continue to do so for an indefinite period, but when they wish they can put an end to this common holding, and ask that there shall be partition. The ground for asking for a partition in such a case is not that described in Article 123, but it is that one of the parties to the agreement by which hitherto they have held the property in common desires to put an end to that agreement and have the property partitioned. When he desires to do that, he has a right to come to the Court to get the Court to do it for him. I think, therefore, the decision that this suit was barred by time was wrong and a preliminary decree for partition should be made as proposed.

Appeal from a decision of the District Judge, Sonthal Parganas.

Messrs. N. C. Sinha and N. C. Ghosh, for the Appellant.

Messrs. P. N. Sinha, R. C. Bhaduri and B. C. De, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

COUTTS, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought under section 25-A, Regulation III of 1872, to set aside an order of the Commissioner in a settlement appeal regarding the boundary between two villages, Chhatakuram and Tarapathar Jore in the Sonthal Parganas. The suit was dismissed and on appeal to the District Judge this decision was confirmed. The plaintiff has accordingly filed this second appeal to this Court.

It appears that the dispute between the two villages as to the boundary has been going on since the year 1873. In that year there was a settlement made by Mr. Wood and the boundary was laid down according to title and possession. The Assistant Settlement Officer at that time found that the Revenue Survey line which had been laid down in 1849 was the correct boundary. This was also found to be the correct boundary at the time of Mr. McPherson's Settlement in 1893 to 1907, and it had been found to be the correct boundary by both the lower Courts in this suit. There can be no doubt that this is the correct boundary, the plaintiff, therefore, fails on this ground, and the only question is, whether he can succeed on the ground of having acquired a title by adverse possession for over 12 years. The learned District Judge has found that he cannot because the Pradhan intervenes between him and the tenants who are in actual possession of the land.

The point urged before us in appeal is that the fact that the Pradhan intervenes between the tenants and the Ghatwal does not prevent the tenants, and consequently the plaintiff, from acquiring title by adverse possession. The decision of this point depends on the status of the Pradhan in the Sonthal Parganas. It is contended by the learned Vakil for the appellants that he is nothing but an officer appointed to collect rents and to do Police and other duties and that he has none of the attributes of a tenure-holder which would prevent tenants inducted by him from acquiring rights by adverse possession against the landlord. To define the status of a Pradhan in the Sonthal Parganas is a somewhat difficult matter. It is true that he is not a tenure holder in the ordinarily accepted sense, but he has all the attributes of a tenure holder and possibly he has greater rights. In his Settlement Report, which is a recognized authority, Mr. McPherson in Paragraph 89 says: "Part II of the Record of Rights deals with the rights and duties of the headman and raiyats. It cannot be too strongly emphasized that the headman is not a tenure holder as defined, for example, in the Bengal Tenancy Act. He is merely the head or representative raiyat of the village chosen by his fellows with the approval of the Deputy Commissioner to deal with the proprietor or rent receiver and to perform certain village duties that are renderable to the State. His office carries with it certain privileges. These duties and privileges are defined in sections 11 and 12 of Part II. In so far as he is a raiyat, the headman has the same rights and duties as are common to his fellow raiyats and as are defined in the remaining sections of Part II. Locally the headman is variously known as Manjhi, Pradhan or Mustagir. In the records now published, he has been invariably called Pradhan. The local use of the words Manjhi and Mustagir really marks a difference of origin which was effaced by the levelling influences of the First Settlement. The Manjhi was the head raiyat of an aboriginal or semi-aboriginal community who had social as well as official functions to perform. The Mustagir was the person to whom a proprietor leased a cultivated village on jara or thika, that is, at a rent fixed for a term of years with the right to collect what he could from the raiyats, or a piece of jungle for proclamation at a rent similarly fixed. Such a Mustagir might be foreign to the rest of the community or be an ordinary aboriginal headman. Proprietors in the old days drew no fine distinctions. Mr. Wood took them all as he found them and moulded them after one and the same pattern. The result is, the headman or Pradhan, as we find him to day, occupying a position that in relation to the proprietor, the raiyats, and the State is practically uniform all over the district."

It would appear, then, that the Pradhan, although not a tenure-holder as defined in the Bengal Tenancy Act at the present day, combines both the attributes of Jeth raiyat or head raiyat of a village and Ijaradar or true tenure-holder. And this is also clear from the Record of Rights itself. In the Record of Rights the duties of the Pradhan are, shortly, to collect and punctually pay the rents to the proprietor, to perform the prescribed Police duties, with the assistance of the raiyats to repair dykes, dams, etc., and to guard the rights of Government. The rights of the headman, which are defined under section 12, are, during the currency of his lease, to enjoy the official holding on payment of rent; to receive one anna per rupee on the rent collected from the raiyats in addition to the rent due from them; to receive a deduction of one anna per rupee on the rent payable to the proprietor if paid in due time; to settle the holdings of absconding raiyats or raiyats who have died without heirs, in accordance with certain rules, and to enjoy during the term of his settlement rent free such of the village waste as he reclaims himself and to recover rents at half the settlement rates for so much of the waste as raiyats reclaim.

It is clear from this, then, that, in regard to settlement of land, the Pradhan has higher rights than a tenure-holder. He holds under a patta from the Settlement Officer and he is, to all intents and purposes, a tenure-holder; in addition, he is also an official who holds his office subject to certain conditions; but the fact that he has this latter status cannot detract from his status as a tenure-holder and, in this connection, I should like to refer to Mr. McPherson's own judgment in respect of this very dispute. He says,—"The question is whether a Pradhan is in such a position (i.e., the position of a tenure-holder). I think that he undoubtedly is. The Pradhan is an official appointed by Government. While he holds office, he, for all practical purposes, ousts the authority of the proprietor. It is his business to collect rents, to grant reclamation leases, to guard the village boundaries, to perform Police duties and generally to direct the village economy. He only comes into contact with the proprietor when he goes to pay him his annual rent."

In my opinion, therefore, the view taken by the learned District Judge is correct and that no title by adverse possession has been acquired in this case.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Mr. P. V. Nijsure, for the Appellant.

Mr. B. J. Desai (with him Mr. P. V. Kane), for Respondents Nos. 1 and 2.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—This was, in effect, a redemption suit filed by the plaintiffs in 1914 to redeem and recover property mortgaged in 1902. It appears that the plaintiffs filed suit No. 220 of 1905 to redeem the mortgage, but not wishing to proceed with that suit they were allowed to withdraw it with permission to bring a fresh suit provided that such suit was brought within two years, and that the costs of defendants in that suit were first paid. This suit was brought eight years after the withdrawal, and the plaintiffs' suit has, therefore, been dismissed on the ground that they have not complied with the conditions imposed by the order allowing them to withdraw the first suit. It appears to us that the Court has failed to consider what was the nature of the suit filed in 1905. It is also possible that the considerations which induced the Full Bench to decide the case of Ramji v. Pandharinath (1) had not been recognised in the previous decisions of the Indian Courts. The effect of the order made by the Court in the previous suit was to restrict the period of limitation which is allowed by law to a mortgagor to redeem. So long as it has not been decided that there was no mortgage at all, then the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee existed. The law allows a particular period to the mortgagor within which he can redeem the mortgage. The mere fact that he files a suit to redeem and then either abandons or withdraws it will not deprive him of his right to redeem. It is only when there has been a decision that there was no mortgage at all that it necessarily follows that the right to redeem which has been set up falls to the ground. The result, therefore, of the decision of both Courts in this case would be that, although it has never been decided that the plaintiff is not a mortgagor, still he has no right left in him to redeem the property, and that, on general principles, must be wrong. Therefore, in my opinion, the view taken by the learned District Judge and the order made in Suit No. 220 of 1905 was erroneous and there was nothing in that order which affected the plaintiffs' right to redeem during the period of limitation allowed by the Indian Limitation Act. We set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and remand the case for findings on facts. Costs, costs in the cause.

HRATON, J.—The only matter of importance with which we are concerned is, whether the present suit is beyond time. The plaintiffs who brought an earlier suit for redemption had been allowed to withdraw that suit with leave to bring another, provided they brought that other within two years. They have now brought another suit for redemption; but they have not done so within two years; they have, indeed, allowed eight years to elapse. Apart from any other matter whatever, having regard to section 374 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882, which lays down that the law of limitation is not affected when leave is given, I should say that it was not open to the Court to impose a limitation of two years. Consequently, I should hold that the suit is within time. My Lord, the Chief Justice, has dealt with another aspect of the case, namely, that the right to bring a suit for redemption is not lost so long as there has not been the decision of a Court against the existence of the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee. No doubt that in general is so, but I do not at present myself wish to express any opinion whether, supposing a plaintiff brings a suit for redemption and abandons it, he would then have, or would not have, a right to bring a fresh suit for redemption. The particular matter before us can be disposed of, I think, without expressing an opinion on that point. I agree that the case should be remanded to be determined by the Court of first appeal on its merits. Costs, costs in the cause.

If the landlord is in any way responsible for the dispossession of an occupancy tenant by any person, a suit by the tenant to recover possession of the holding will be a suit under the Bengal Tenancy Act and will be governed by Article 3, Schedule III, of the Act, whether the landlord is made a party to the suit or not. If, on the other hand, the landlord has not in any way caused the dispossession, the suit will be governed by the Limitation Act irrespective of the fact whether the landlord is or is not made a party to the suit. [p. 47, col. 2.]

Second appeal from a decision of the District Judge, Bhagalpur, dated the 20th January 1919, confirming that of the Munsif, Banka, dated the 7th March 1918.

Mr. Ramprasad, for the Appellant.

Messrs. H. L. Nandekeolyar and B. P. Jhunjhunwala, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit in ejectment. The plaintiffs claimed to be occupancy tenants of the lands in three khatas, Nos. 154, 155, and 156. The defendants first party had, in execution of a decree against the father of the plaintiffs, purchased a portion of the lands described in Schedule II of the plaint, on 14th November 1907, and obtained delivery of possession on the 17th February 1903.

The plaintiffs' case was that the defendants first party dispossessed them of the rest of the lands also in the said khatas described in Schedule I of the plaint and, therefore, they instituted the present suit for recovery of possession of their lands in the said khatas, excepting the lands covered by the sale certificate in favour of the defendants. The defendants fourth party are the tenure-holders under the Baneili Raj, the Zemindar of the village. We are not concerned in this case with defendants second and third parties.

The defendants contested the claim on various grounds. They alleged that they were put in possession of the lands by the landlords themselves and they were recognised by them as tenants of the lands. The defendants, however, did not appear and the case was decided ex parte upon the evidence of one witness, Isri Pandey, on behalf of the plaintiffs, and the Munsif held that the case of the plaintiffs was proved upon that evidence and accordingly gave a decree in their favour.

In appeal, the defendants contended that the suit was barred by Article 3, Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act which provides a period of two years limitation from the date of dispossession for suits to recover possession of land claimed by the plaintiff as an occupancy raiyat; the learned District Judge overruled this contention and dismissed the appeal.

The contention is repeated in this Court. It is conceded that, upon the allegations in the plaint and the evidence of Isri Pandey, the plaintiffs were dispossessed by the father of the defendants and that there was no allegation that the landlord had either taken any active part or acquiesced in their dispossession. It is, however, urged that the said Article of the Bengal Tenancy Act should apply to the case by the mere fact that the landlord is made a party to the suit. The landlords were impleaded as pro forma defendants simply in order to remove future objections, as stated in paragraph 16 of the plaint, and as the names of the defendants first party were entered in the landlords' Sarishta. This latter fact has been denied by Isri Pandey, witness of the plaintiff. Even if it be assumed, as stated in the plaint, that the names of the defendants first party were recorded in the landlords' Sarishta, that would not necessarily show that they had in any way contributed to the dispossession of the plaintiffs from the lands in suit. The question of being a party or not, does not at all affect the principle upon which the said Article should be applied. If the landlord is in any way responsible for the dispossession of the tenant by any person, it will be a suit under the Bengal Tenancy Act for recovery of possession of the occupancy right and will be governed by the Article in question, whether the landlord is made a party or not. If, on the other hand, he has not in any way caused the dispossession, the suit will be governed by the General Limitation Act irrespective of the fact that the landlord is made a party to the suit. The case of Aminuddin Munshi v. Ulfutunnissa Bibi (1), relied upon by the learned Vakil on behalf of the appellants is clearly distinguishable, inasmuch as the Article was applied upon the finding that the dispossession in the case was made by the landlord through the contesting defendant who acted in collusion in dispossessing the plaintiffs. It is, therefore, clear that whether the Article does or does not apply depends upon the circumstances of ouster and if it is a consequence of the landlords' action the said rule of limitation will apply, otherwise the general law of 12 years' limitation will govern the suit. The suit is, therefore, not barred by limitation and the appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Mr. N. V. Gokhale, for the Appellant.

Mr. B. G. Rao for Mr. G. S. Rao, for Respondent No. 2.

JUDGMENT.—In this case Abdulla and Allisahab were two Sunni Muhammadans who owned certain property as heirs of their father in equal shares. Abdulla died in 1888 leaving two widows, Jamalbi and Latifa, and his brother Allisaheb. Under Muhammadan Law the widows would take two annas out of Abdulla's eight annas. Allisaheb would take six annas. Allisaheb died in 1897 leaving a widow Amina. She would succeed, according to Muhammadan Law, to the fourteen annas of her husband. It has been argued that she would only be entitled to one-fourth of her husband's estate and, in the absence of sharers, residuaries and distant kindred the three-fourths would escheat to the Crown. That is not Muhammadan Law as we understand it. I may refer to Mulla's Muhammadan Law, 5th Edition, where the author deals in a simple manner with the doctrine of "Return." In the illustration of a Muhammadan dying leaving a widow as his sole heir; he says, the widow will take one-fourth as sharer and the remaining three fourths by "Return." The surplus three-fourths does not escheat to the Government." He refers to Mohamed Arshad Chowdhry v. Sajidabanoo (1) and Bofatun v. Bilaiti Khanum (2). It is obvious, therefore, that the defendants' contention cannot be sustained, and the plaintiff succeeds to the fourteen annas as the heir of Amina. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

The provisions of section 342 of the Criminal Procedure ode are of general application, and are applicable to all trials including Sessions cases, and an omission to examine an accused person in a Sessions case is not a mere irregularity curable by section 37 of the Code, but is fatal to the trial, irrespective of whether the provisions of section 342 are merely directory or mandatory [p. 56, col. 2. p. 57, cols. & 2]

A retracted confession, uncorroborated in material particulars by independent and reliable evidence and which does not bear the impress of truth, cannot be used for any purpose, much less for the purpose of basing a conviction thereon. [p. 59, col ; p 60, col. 1.]

Where one of several accused persons has not appealed to the High Court and the case against him is weaker than it is against those who have appealed and are acquitted, it is within the competency of the Court to set aside his conviction also. [p. 60, col. 1.]

Mr. Manohar Lal, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Respondent.

The case originally came before Mullick and Sultan Ahmad, JJ., who delivered the following

JUDGMENT.

MULLICK, J.—In my opinion, the omission on the part of a Sessions Judge to examine the accused under section 342, Criminal Procedure Code, before calling on him for his defence is neither illegal nor irregular. On the contrary section 289 expressly states that such examination is discretionary. If that is not so, then I think it must follow that section 289 contemplates that in every summons case there shall be at least two examinations of the accused, that is to say, one at the discretion of the presiding officer, before the accused is asked whether he means to adduce evidence, and another, which is compulsory, immediately after he has elected to adduce evidence or when he has declined to adduce evidence immediately after the Public Prosecutor has addressed the Court; and if the provisions of section 342 are mandatory, it also follows that even though a Court has fully examined the accused at the close of the case for the prosecution, he is bound, at the risk of the whole trial being vitiated, to examine him again the next moment, when nothing has been added to the record except the intimation that he will produce defence evidence. That surely could not have been the intention of the Legislature, nor does the language itself of section 289 require such a construction. The truth is that section 342 is an enabling section. It expressly states a general provision applicable to all the trials. It shows this in the first line. It is directory but not mandatory, and it is subject to the earlier provisions relating to the trial of summons cases, warrant and Sessions cases and to enquiries of a judicial character.

I have not been shown any case, which has decided that an omission to examine the accused in a summons case vitiates the trial, but if section 342 is mandatory, then I fail to see why there should be any exception in regard to summons cases. If it is argued that in a summons case the accused is never called on for his defence, the reply seems to be that there is no virtue in these particular words and the accused in a summons case is called on for his defence after the prosecution is closed just as much as an accused in any other case. It has been held, however, in regard to warrant cases that the omission to examine the accused is fatal to the trial. It is not necessary for me here to discuss the correctness of that view but, in my opinion, so far as this Court is concerned, the matter may possibly require further consideration. The true view, it seems to me, is that the Court shall not convict a man without giving him an opportunity of explaining his case, but if the Court has already before it, either in the shape of a written statement as provided for in section 256 and in proceedings under Chapters VIII and X or in the submissions made by the accused's Counsel, a complete and satisfactory statement of the defence of the accused, I fail to see for what purpose an oral examination is necessary. In general an ignorant accused, who is represented by Counsel, is well advised if he declines to give any answer to questions under section 342 other than that his Counsel will make his submissions or that he will file a written statement. A reply of this kind adds nothing to the case and failure to give the accused an opportunity of making such a reply cannot surely be a reason for condemning the whole proceeding. Indeed, the earlier decisions in the High Court of Calcutta have gone so far as to rule that while it is not competent to the Court to refuse to allow the accused to make a statement Abdul Guffoor, In re (1)], a trial is not bad even when there was on the record neither a statement by the accused, nor anything to show the nature of the defence [Gopal Hajam, In re (2)]. In the latter case, it was held that, as there had been no miscarriage of justice, the conviction could not be set aside.

Whatever may be said of summons and warrant cases, I do not think there can be the least doubt that, as regards Sessions cases, section 342 was never intended to be mandatory. Under section 287 the accused's statement before the committing Magistrate must be read out and put in evidence and, therefore, section 289 enacts that no further examination is obligatory. Khudiram Bose v. Emperor (3) is clear authority for this view. On the other hand, I have found no case, which has gone so far as to hold that the provisions of section 342 are mandatory and that failure to comply with them vitiates the trial.

In Emperor v. Ansuiya (4) a single Judge of the Allahadad High Court expressed the opinion that section 342, Criminal Procedure Code, was imperative in a Sessions trial but the Court, nevertheless, condoned its violation and upheld the conviction.

In Emperor v. Raju Ahilaji (5) a Division Bench of the Bombay High Court expressed serious doubts as to whether section 342 applied to a Sessions trial but following an earlier case of that Court, Emperor v. Savalya Atma Pastya (6), and in view of the special circumstances of the case before them, they ordered a re trial.

In Queen Empress v. Vinan (7) one of the learned Judges expressed the opinion that when a confession is retracted, the accused should be questioned under sections 287 and 289, Criminal Procedure Code, read with section 342 as to the circumstances under which the confession was taken. That case, however, does not lay down that an examination under section 342 is imperative after the statement under section 287 has been put in evidence. Their Lordships merely repeated the settled proposition that the accused must be given a chance of letting the Court know what his case is. On the other hand Mr. Mayne in his Criminal Law, page 934 (1896 Edition), cites Gandi Tataiya In the matter of (8) and observes that it has been held that no such examination should take place, if the prisoner has placed himself absolutely in the hands of his Pleader. He expresses the opinion that probably the rule is not inflexible and that a good deal must depend on the competence of the defence.

The result, therefore, is that, in my opinion, the examination of the accused under section 342 is not obligatory in a Sessions case. I think that where it is clear that the Court has not ascertained what the defence of the accused is, the failure to question him is fatal to the trial. But where the Court is already in possession of his defence, failure to prepare a proper record is an irregularity curable under section 537.

In the case before us, the accused Chaku is a boy of 14, while the accused Raghu is an ex-Chawkidar. The dacoity was committed on the night of the 2nd June. They were arrested on the 3rd and confessed forthwith to the village official, Ram Jiban. They were sent to the Thana the same day but brought back to the place of occurrence on the 4th. On the 5th they were despatched to Purulia and produced on the 6th before a Magistrate, who remanded them to jail in order that they might not confess without full consideration. On the 7th they were brought from the jail to the Magistrate's house and after full warning they repeated the confession, which had been made before Ram Jiban. No reason has been shown why the confession should be disbelieved, and I agree with the learned Sessions Judge that Raghu certainly was not likely to be tutored into making a false confession. In the commiting Court Chaku denied having made any confession at all, while Raghu said he did not remember the details of his statement.

A further examination under section 342 would have added nothing to the defence and I am satisfied that there has been no miscarriage of justice in this case. It was open to the accused to call evidene to show that the confessions were obtained by coercion and undue influence, but this they failed to do. In my opinion there was no irregularity in the trial and I would dismiss the appeal.

SULTAN AHMED, J.—The appellant was tried on a charge of dacoity, committed in the house of one Milan Mahto on the 2nd June 1919. On the 3rd of June, the accused and three others were suspected and they were arrested by the Tarafsardar between 10 and 11 A. M. on that date. The first information was lodged at the Thana at 1 P. M., on which the Police started investigation. On the 5th of June at 4 o'clock in the morning the accused was sent in custody to the Sub-Divisional Officer and he arrived in the Court of the Sub Divisional Officer on the 6th of June. On the 7th of June his confession was recorded. He implicatd himself and some others in the commission of the dacoity. He was then sent up to the Magistrate and an enquiry before commitment was taken up. Before the Committing Magistrate he retracted his confession and stated that he did not make any such confession at all. The Magistrate after recording all the evidence in the case committed the accused to the Court of Session. The learned Sessions Judge, disagreeing with the Assessors, convicted the acused, who has now preferred this appeal from jail. The case rests mainly, if not solely, on the retracted confession. The three circumstances which are faintly alleged to be corroborative of the confessions are, firstly, that the accused was found sleeping in his house at 10 A. M. when men in his position would be expected to be working in the fields. Secondly, that the Sub-Inspector had nothing to do with the making of this confession. I think it would be sufficient to point out that the law requires corroboration of confessions not by circumstances, such as I have mentioned above. In my opinion, it is doing violence to all principles of law bearing on the subject to treat such circumstances as corroborative evidence of a confession. Therefore, there is nothing except the retracted confession of the accused upon which the conviction could be based. I have already stated that when the Committing Magistrate examined the accused under section 342 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the accused stated that he had made no confession. No further questions were put to him by the Committing Magistrate and the matter ended there. In the Sessions Court it appears that the learned Judge omitted to examine the accused under section 342, Criminal Procedure Code, and, before I deal with the confession, it is necessary to consider the effect of this omission. Section 342 of the Criminal Procedure Code is to be found in Chapter XXIV, which contains general provisions as to enquiries and trials. That section 342 is applicable to trials under Chapter XXI has been held in the case reported as Mahomed Hossein v. Emperor (9) and also in this Court by Mr. Justice Das in the case of Misra Ahir v. Emperor (10), and non-compliance with section 342, Criminal Procedure Code, in trials under that Chapter has been held to vitiate the conviction. It now remains for me to consider whether section 342, Criminal Procedure Code, applies to Sessions trials. Section 342 provides for the examination of the accused after the witnesses for the prosecution have been examined and before he is called on for his defence. (The italics are mine.) Now, if we examine the provisions of Chapter XXIII, we find that section 271 says that, when the Court is ready to commence the trial, the accused shall appear or be brought before it and the charge shall be read out in Court, and explained to him and he shall be asked whether he is guilty of the offence charged or claims to be tried. It the accused pleads guilty, the plea shall be recorded and he may be convicted thereon. Then section 289, clause (1), says that when the examination of the witnesses for the prosecution and the examination (if any) of the accused are concluded, the accused shall be asked whether he means to adduce evidence. (The italics are mine.) So that it will appear from an analysis of the two relevant sections, I have quoted above, that Chapter XXIII provides for examination of the accused once under section 271 if that can be called an examination at all, and again under section 289, clause (1), after the witnesses for the prosecution have been examined. But it has been suggested that the words "and the examination (if any) of the accused" in section 289, clause (1) clearly show that it is left to the discretion of the Sessions Judge to examine the accused, and it is, therefore, argued that section 342 does not apply to Sessions trials at all. An examination of section 289, clauses 1 and 4, will show that after the prosecution witnesses have been examined and before the accused is asked whether he means to adduce evidence he shall be examined by the Judge, and this examination is discretionary. But when the accused says 'he does not mean to adduce evidence,' the prosecutor shall sum up his case and, if the Court considers that there is evidence that the accused committed the offence, the Court shall call on the accused to enter on his defence. The words "to enter on his defence" in section 289, clause (4), must not be confused with the words "to adduce evidence" under clause (1). It is clear that section 289 does not provide for any examination of the accused after the examination of the prosecution witnesses and before he has been called upon to enter on his defence. Section 342, however, applies to the examination of the accused at that stage and, therefore, the examination of the accused under section 289, clause (1), in my opinion, does not in the least affect the mandatory provision of section 342 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Provision is made under section 256, clause (4), and under section 289, clause 4, for calling upon the accused to enter upon his defence in warrant and Sessions trials respectively. But there is no provision except under section 342, Criminal Procedure Code, for the examination of the accused before he is called to enter on his defence. Therefore, section 342 must be held to apply to warrant and Sessions trials. It does not, however, apply to summons trials, for the simple reason that there is no provision under Chapter XX for calling the accused to enter on his defence, which is a condition which must be satisfied before the mandatory part of section 342 can come into play. I, therefore, hold that section 342 applies to a trial under Chapter XXIII and the omission to examine the accused under section 342 vitiates the trial and is fatal to the conviction of the accused. It has been pointed out in the case of Emperor v. Raju Ahilaji (5) that the provisions of section 342 of the Code of Criminal Procedure have been consistently held by the Bombay High Court to apply to the case of an accused tried by a Sessions Judge even when he has been questioned on the case by the Committing Court. It has also been held in Queen Empress v. Viran (7) that section 342 of the Code of Criminal Procedure applies to Sessions trials. The same view has been taken in the case of Emperor v. Ansuiya (4), where Mr. Justice Burkitt held that the examination of the accused under section 342 in a Sessions case is imperative and cannot be substituted by the filing of a written statement on behalf of the defence. It was also laid down in the case of Gandi Fataiya, In the matter of (8) and Raja Tadayachi, In re (11) that a Sessions Judge is not relieved from the necessity of questioning the accused for the purpose of enabling him to explain any circumstances appearing in the evidence against him and that the provisions of section 342 are mandatory and are applicable to a Sessions trial. The same view was adopted by Chitty and Beachcroft, JJ., in Emperor v. Dwijendra Chandra Mukerjee (12). The only case, which seems to be incorrect with the view that I have taken, is the case of Khudiram Bose v. Emperor (3). It will be noticed that in this case the accused confessed his guilt when he was examined by the Committing Magistrate under section 342, Criminal Procedure Code, and the learned Judges seem to have been greatly influenced by this fact when they were considering the question whether the omission to examine the accused by the Sessions Judge vitiated the trial. In any case if their Lordships meant to hold that section 342 had no application to a trial under Chapter XXIII, I would respectfully dissent from that view. The learned Judges seem to have been moved by the language of section 289, clause(1), which suggests that the examination of the accused is discretionary. But it seems to me, and I say so with the greatest respect to the learned Judges who decided that case, that they did not take into consideration the stage of the trial to which section 289, clause (1), referred. I have already pointed out that that is the stage before the accused is asked whether he will adduce evidence or not, not the stage when, as is provided under section 289, clause (4), he is called upon to enter on his defence. The real object of the latter part of section 342, clause (1), is to ascertain from the prisoner how he can meet what the Judge may consider to be damnatory evidence against him and I agree that the true view is that the Court shall not convict a man without giving him an opportunity to explain his case. This is one of the first principles of Criminal Jurisprudence and the exercise of this principle could not have been, in my opinion, left to the discretion of the Court. An examination of the accused by the trial Court must be held to be imperative and this can only be if the provision of the latter part of section 342, clause (1), is held to be mandatory. This being my view of the application of section 342 to Chapter XXIII of the Criminal Procedure Code, I have no hesitation in holding that the omission to follow the mandatory provision of section 342 has vitiated the trial and I would on that ground alone set aside the conviction of the accused. But I think, apart from this question, there are two other grounds, upon which the order of conviction must be vacated. I have already pointed out that the case rests solely upon the confession of the accused. Before the committing Magistrate the accused asserted that he had made no such confession. The Sessions Judge did not examine the accused at all and did not, therefore, enquire from him as to the retraction of his confession. Even if it were held that the examination of the accused was discretionary, in my opinion, that discretion has not been properly exercised in this case, and if there was any case in which the Sessions Judge ought to have examined the accused, it was certainly this case, where the main, if not the sole, evidence was the confession of the accused, who was neither defended nor had filed any written statement. It was held in the case of Queen-Empress v. Viran (7) cited above that when confessions are retracted, it is the duty of the Court to examine the accused with reference to their retraction to each and every statement incriminating themselves. Therefore on this ground also I think the conviction must be set aside. The third ground, upon which also, in my opinion, the conviction is not maintainable is that it is unsafe to convict the accused on his retracted confession alone. Though there is no rule of law that a retracted confession must be supported by independent reliable evidence corroborating it in material particulars, yet it has been consistently held that as a matter of prudence it would be unsafe for a Court to rely and act upon confessions alone to convict the accused. See Sofir-ul-deen, In re (13), Queen v. Amanullah (14), Empress v. Jadub Das (15), Queen-Empress v. Mahabir (16), Queen v. Jadub Das (17), Yasin v. King-Emperor (18), Queen Empress v. Rangi (19), Queen v. Thompson (20), Queen Empress v. Bharamappa (21) Queen Empress v. Raru Nayar (22), Deputy Legal Remembrancer v. Karuna Baistobi (23). If there had been other circumstances, from which I could come to an unhesitating conclusion that the confession was true and voluntary, in that case I would not have rejected the confession, but where I find that the Sessions Judge did not make any enquiry as to the retraction of the confession and where I find that, in spite of the assertion of the accused that he had not made any confession at all, the Magistrate, recording the confession, was not examined and where the Assessors have rejected it, and where there is no circumstance which would in any way help me in coming to the unhesitating conclusion that the confession is true, I must refuse to act upon the confession alone and to convict the accused. I would, therefore, set aside the conviction and sentence on the accused.

Owing to difference of opinion between Mullick and Sultan Ahmed, JJ., the case was referred to Jwala Prasad, J.

Mr. Gour Chandra Pal, for the Appellant.

Mr. Manohar Lal, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This case has been referred to me on account of difference of opinion between Mullick and Sultan Ahmed, JJ., who originally heard this appeal.

The appellant Raghu Bhumij alone with Chaku Bhumij has been convicted of dacoity by the Sessions Judge of Manbhum-Sambalpur, disagreeing with the verdict of the Assessors.

The dacoity was committed in the house of one Malin Mahton of village Raherdih about midnight of Monday, the 2nd June 1919. Information of the occurrence was lodged at the Thana at 1 P. M. on Tuesday, the 3rd June 1919. In the meantime Ramjiwan Singh (P. W. No. 6), Taraf Sardar, Sarberia, 6 miles off Raherdih, hearing of the dacoity at once suspected the two accused as well as Ajodhya, father of accused Chaku, and Pahalwan, brother in-law of accused Raghu, as according to him they were "all an idle lot." This suspicion he communicated to Constable Ramratan Singh (P. W. No. 3), who was those days "on round duties in the village in connection with outbreaks of dacoity in the neighbourhood." Thereupon the constable, along with Baneshwar Singh (P. W. No. 4) and Kunjabari Chowkidar (P. W. No. 5), went to the houses of Ajodhya and Pahalwan, where they found Raghu sleeping at 10 A. M. in the house of Pahalwan, his brother in-law, and Chaku in the house of his father, Ajodhya. Their suspicion was then deepened: they arrested the two accused and took them to Sardar Ramjiwan Singh and reported to him the fact of their having been found sleeping so late in the morning. Ramjiwan Singh says "the accused then eventually admitted they had a hand in the dacoity." Thereafter the accused were taken to the Thana and the Sub-Inspector started investigation.

On the 5th June at 4 o'clock the two accused were sent in custody to the Sub-Divisional Officer, where they arrived on the 6th of June. On the 7th of June the Sub Divisional Officer recorded the confessions of the accused. The accused were then sent up and an inquiry before commitment was started.

Before the Committing Magistrate the accused were examined on the 9th of August under section 342 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, when they denied having committed the dacoity and retracted their confessions recorded by the Sub Divisional Officer on the 7th June. They were then committed to the Court of Session and were tried with the aid of Assessors.

In the Court of Sessions the accused pleaded not guilty to the charge. Seven witnesses were then examined on behalf of the prosecution. The accused being undefended, none of the witnesses appear to have been cross-examined on their behalf. A few questions, however, appear to have been put by the Court to prosecution witness No. 4.

The Sub-Divisional Officer, who had recorded the confessions of the accused on the 7th of June, was not examined, but their confessions were put in evidence on behalf of the prosecution under section 80 of the Evidence Act and marked Exhibits 2 and 3, and the examinations of the accused in the Court of the Committing Magistrate, wherein they had retracted their confessions of the 7th June, were then admitted in evidence under section 287 of the Code. There is no record, or anything in the order sheet, showing that the accused were examined by the Sessions Judge under section 342 of the Code of Criminal Procedure after the close of the evidence for the prosecution and before they were called on for their defence. The accused did not adduce any evidence and the Public Prosecutor summed up his case. It does not appear from the order sheet that the accused themselves addressed the Judge or the Assessors in reply after the Public Prosecutor summed up the case.

Both the Assessors agreed in acquitting the accused. As to the confessions, Baneshwer Lal, Assessor No. 1, was of opinion that they were procured by threats and he would not believe them. Chottoo Mian, Assessor No. 2, said that they were not reliable.

The learned Sessions Judge disagreeing with the opinion of the Assessors has convicted the accused. The reasons, upon which the learned Sessions Judge has accepted the retracted confessions of the accused, are: firstly, that they have not explained why they were sleeping till 10 in the morning when men of their position would be expected to be working in the fields, and secondly, that they failed to show that they were tutored by the Police to make the confessions.

This appeal was preferred from jail by Raghu Bhumij and was heard by a Criminal Bench presided over by Mullick and Sultan Ahmad, JJ. In the absence of any record of the examination of the accused under section 342 of the Code of Criminal Procedure in the Court of Session, the learned Judges held that there was an omission on the part of the Sessions Judge to examine the accused under section 342 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, but they differed as to the effect of this omission upon the validity or otherwise of the trial. Mullick, J., was of opinion that it was neither illegal nor irregular and an examination of the accused under section 342 of the Code is only directory and not mandatory in a Sessions case. Sultan Ahmed, J., on the other hand held that the provisions of section 342 are mandatory and the omission to examine the accused vitiated the trial. On that ground alone he would set aside the conviction. The learned Judges further differed as to the propriety of the conviction in the present case upon the retracted confession of the accused.

As to the first point, it is conceded by Mullick, J., that section 342 is a general provision applicable to trials of all cases including Sessions cases. The view that the provisions in section 342 are only discretionary and not obligatory is opposed to the plain language, object and scope of the section. The first part of the section no doubt is discretionary as is clear from the use of the word "may." Under it the Court is empowered to examine the accused at any stage and at any time it considers necessary without previously warning the accused. The second part is obligatory, as is clear from the use of the word "shall." It requires the Court to examine the accused after the witnesses for the prosecution have been examined and before the accused is called on for his defence.

In the earlier Acts, the examination of the accused person was discretionary with the Court: vide section 373 of Act XXV of 1861 and Act VIII of 1869. In Act X of 1872, while the discretionary nature of the examination was retained so far as inquiries and trials of cases other than Sessions cases were concerned, it was made compulsory for Sessions trials. Section 250 of that Act occurred in the Chapter relating to Sessions trials and ran as follows:—

"The Court may from time to time at any stage of the trial examine the accused person and shall question him generally on the case after the witnesses for the prosecution have been examined and before he is called on for his defence."

In 1882 the provisions relating to the examination of an accused person, which were scattered in different Chapters in the previous Acts, were removed from those Chapters and brought under one Chapter headed "General provisions relating to enquiries and trials." Section 250 of Act X of 1872 was, therefore, removed from the Chapter relating to Sessions trials, but its provisions were embodied in their entirety in section 342 of the Code of 1882 as well as 1908. The object of the examination of the accused person being to enable him to explain any circumstance appearing in the evidence against him, section 250 of the Code of 1872 in the Chapter relating to Sessions trials conferred upon the accused person a right of being examined after the witnesses for the prosecution were examined and before he was called on for his defence. Such a vested right could not be taken away from the accused person without any express provision to that effect in the subsequent legislation of 1882 and 1908. Far from there being any indication to divest an accused person of this right, the Codes of 1882 and 1908 seem to expressly confirm it by section 342.

It is then said that section 289, clause (1), occurring in Chapter XXIII relating to Sessions trials in the present Code, controls section 342 and makes the examination of the accused person discretionary by the use of the words "examination, if any," in that section. But section 289 in itself does not make any provision for the examination of the accused person. Its object is to simply lay down the stage at which "the accused shall be asked whether he means to adduce evidence," namely, after the examination of the witnesses for the prosecution and the examination, if any, of the accused person, which the Court in its discretion may hold under the first part of section 342.

This is with a view to enable the Court to apply the procedure laid down in subsequent clauses (2), (3) and (4) of section 289 depending upon the answer of the accused that he does or does not mean to adduce any evidence. The calling upon the accused to state "whether he means to adduce evidence" is different from, and happens to be much earlier in point of time and stage than, the calling on him "to enter on his defence." The latter stage arises only under clause (4) when the Court considers that there is evidence that the accused committed the offence. At this stage the obligatory part of section 342 comes in, which requires the Court to question the accused generally on the case to enable him to explain any circumstance appearing in the evidence against him. It is immaterial whether the Court has examined the accused person several times or has not examined him at all under the first part of section 342 The examination, if any, referred to in clause (1) of section 289 is under this part of section 342 and it does not relieve the Court from its duty of examining the accused before he is called upon to enter upon his defence as defined in section 290 of the Code.

The words "examination, if any," also occur in section 255 relating to trials of warrant cases and in section 263 (g) relating to trials of summons cases: yet it has been held that the examination of the accused person is obligatory in such cases under section 342 of the Code of Criminal Procedure before the accused is called on for his defence, the omission of which vitiates the trial and the conviction should be set aside, vide Mahomed Hossein v. Emperor (9), Misra Ahir v. Emperor (10) decided by Das, J., and Emperor v. Harischandra Talcherkar (24). It is difficult to see why the principle of these authorities should not apply to Sessions cases, particularly when section 256 in the Chapter relating to warrant cases is similar to section 289, clause (4), in the Chapter relating to Sessions trials. As a matter of fact all the High Courts in India seem to agree that the examination of an accused person is obligatory in Sessions trials also: Emperor v. Ansuiya (4), Emperor v. Savalya Atma Pastya (6), Emperor v. Raju Ahilaji (5), Basapa Ningapa v Emperor (25), Gandi Tataiya, In the matter of (8), Queen-Empress v. Viran (7), Raia adaiyachi, In re (11) and Emperor v. Nga Po Mya (26). No doubt, in the case of Gopal Hajjam, In re (2) Jackson and Ainslie, JJ. took a contrary view, but that was decided in February 1871 when the Acts of 1861 and 1869 were in force, under which the examination of the accused was discretionary: vide sections 372 to 374 of those Acts. Besides in that case the accused severally addressed the Jury themselves, and in the circumstances it was held that the prisoners were not prejudiced by the omission to make any note of the defence set up by them under the aforesaid sections. But when section 250 of Act X of 1872 made the examination of an accused person compulsory in Sessions trials, it was held in 1881 in the case of Abdul Gafoor, In re (1) that it was not competent to the Court to refuse to allow the prisoner to make a statement. This view finds support in the observation of Sir Lawrence Jenkins in the Special Bench case of Emperor v. Nogendra Nath Sen Gupta (27) and of Beachcroft, J., in the case of Emperor v. Dwijendra Chandra Mukerjee (12).

Brett and Reves, JJ., in the case of Khudiram Bose v. Emperor (3) thought that the examination of the accused person under section 342 was not necessary and the omission did not constitute an illegality which would vitiate the trial. This is a solitary case, and perhaps the view taken therein is due to the peculiar circumstances of the case, where the accused admitted his guilt and had been examined in detail under section 342 of the Code before the Committing Magistrate.

The majority of the Judges in the several High Courts have held that in the Sessions trials also the examination of the accused person is mandatory. There is, however, difference of opinion as to whether the omission was curable under section 537 of the Code.

Mr. Justice Burkitt in the case of Emperor v. Ansuiya (4) and the earlier decisions in Madras in the cases of Gandi Tataiya, In the matter of (8) and Raja Padayachi, In re (11) would under certain circumstances condone the omission, but these Madras cases in spite of that ordered a re trial.

The Bombay High Court had always set aside the convictions in such circumstances, although in the case of Emperor v. Savalya Atma Pastya (6) some serious doubt was expressed as to the omission being fatal.

Since the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Subramania Iyer v. King-Emperor (28) the Burma Court in Emperor v. Nga Po Mya (2[illegible]) and the Bombay High Court in Basapa Ningapa v. Emperor (25) probably not cited before Mullick, J., held that the omission was fatal to the trial and was incurable by the provisions of section 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. In the latter cases it was further observed, as in the case of Queen-Empress v. Viran (7), that it is immaterial that the appellant had an opportunity of making a statement before the Committing Magistrate or that the accused was defended by a Pleader, for such an important step in the procedure cannot be left to his Pleader. In the present case no written statement was filed by the accused, and even if it were filed it could not take the place of an examination under section 342. They were undefended and there was no cross-examination by them of any of the prosecution witnesses. They had retracted their confessions in the Court of the Committing Magistrate. It was incumbent upon the Sessions Judge in the circumstances of the present case to have examined the accused before acting upon their retracted confessions, even if such an examination was only discretionary.

The learned Sessions Judge in his judgment referring to the confessions said that "the accused retracted them both here and in the lower Court," and in another place he said that "the accused simply alleged that they were tutored." From this the learned Assistant Government Advocate contended that the accused were probably examined by the Sessions Judge. I, therefore, enquired of the Sessions Judge as to the materials upon which the aforesaid passages in his judgment were based, and in reply in his letter No. 420R, dated the 27th March 1920, the learned Sessions Judge says that he examined the accused in his Court under section 342 of the Code. But he did not record the answers and the questions inasmuch as the accused had nothing to add to what they had said before the Committing Magistrate. In this he has contravened the provisions of section 364 of the Criminal Procedure Code. It is more than doubtful whether an omission to prepare a record of the examination of the accused persons under section 364 can be cured by section 533 of the Code. Even if it could be cured, the report that he has now forwarded goes to show that he did not do more than reading out to them the confessions recorded by the accused on the 7th of June before the Sub-Divisional Officer and their statements taken by the Committing Magistrate on the 9th August. The accused adhered to the retraction of the confessions. They were not examined as to the circumstances disclosed in the prosecution evidence which the learned Sessions Judge has used against the accused and this, to my mind, amounts to an omission to examine the accused under section 342 and to prepare a proper record thereof under section 364 of the Code, so much essential in a Sessions trial where an accused is entitled to have his statement considered by the Assessors and the Appellate Court. The learned Sessions Judge has, by disregarding the strict provisions of law, seriously prejudiced the accused in the present case, even if these provisions were only directory and not mandatory. The trial is, therefore, vitiated.

Now as to whether this is a case where a re-trial should be ordered or the accused be set at large. The learned Sessions Judge has relied on two circumstances already noticed for accepting the retracted confessions of the accused :—

(1) that they were found sleeping late in the morning at 10 A. M. in their houses. The learned Sessions Judge himself does not think it by itself to be a very suspicious fact, except that the accused by their position would at that time be expected to be working in the fields. Even if it be suspicious, it does not necessarily show that the accused were concerned in the dacoity in question, 5 or 6 miles away from the place of occurrence. It does not, however, exclude the possibility of their being concerned in some other dacoity rampant in the locality, or it may be due to some other circumstances.

(2). The learned Sessions Judge says that there is no reason for the Police to have tutored the accused. The accused did not make any confessions when the Constable arrested them in their houses, but when they were brought to the Taraf Sardar and reported to have been found sleeping late, they "then eventually admitted they had a hand in the dacoity." The Taraf Sardar along with the other Police Officers was, according to the finding of the Magistrate, suspected as being "hand in glove with the dacoits" and was, therefore, interested in exculpating himself and the other village Police Officers from any complicity in the dacoity in question and making the accused scapegoats.

I would not, therefore, take the confessions as free from suspicion, particularly when the accused retracted them at the first opportunity offered to them to make a statement about them before the Committing Magistrate. The learned Sessions Judge towards the end of his judgment says that he accepted the confessions as being corroborated by circumstances, probably the aforesaid two circumstances. They can in no sense be said to be corroborations of the incident of the dacoity in question and do not necessarily show that the accused took part in it.

Now as to whether the accused can be convicted upon their retracted confessions, uncorroborated as they are by any circumstance.

The confession of Raghu Bhumij is in the following terms.

"Last Sunday I committed a dacoity at Raherdih. Jurala Kheria, Ranjit Kheria, Palan Bhumij, Mansa Bhumij, Budha Bhumij, Ajodhya Bhumij, Beni Gour, Jadu Dhopa, Chanda Kurmi, Suka Bhumij all of them were with me. We gathered together in the house of Lohar Manjhi at village Kuchia. Then we started for Raherdih, where in a Mahto's house we lighted a torch and committed a dacoity. Hurra Kheria first entered the house. Ranjit and Hurra Kheriah bound three persons of the house and beat them. We had tangis with us. We then took away paddy and rice. Chanda Kurmi, who was with us, took clothes. We got no other things. I got five seers of rice. We distributed (the articles) on the bank of the Bandh in the forest of Kumir Kocha. Besides this I have nothing more to say."

Chaku Bhumij in his confession, after saying that Beni Gour, Jadu Dhopa, Chanda Kurmi, Ranjit Kheria, Hurra Kheria, Palan Bhumij, Mansa Bhumij and Ajodheya Buhmij had committed dacoities at Barndhi, Bulandih and Margaon (in the last also Bhim Mura, Mahinda Kalu, Lohar Manjhi and Kanai Mahton), stated "all the above men were dacoits in the dacoity at Raherdih and six others of village Kushthir whose names I do not know. In all these dacoities I threw stones, and got paddy and rice."

Then he mentioned the different places where the booties of the four dacoities were distributed. As regards the Raherdih dacoity in question, he stated that the "articles were distributed near the Balkucha Bandh."

As to what happened after the dacoits arrived at the place of occurrence, the first information has given much more details and vivid description of it, covering a typed page and a half more than the confessions of the accused. A reference to the documents themselves will show this. Chaku has given no details beyond stating that he took a minor part of throwing stones at the house of the complainant. Raghu's account of it consists only in stating that the dacoits lighted a torch at the house of the complainant and tied down and beat three persons. Even in the little details that they have given they have been contradicted by the complainant in the first information, where he says that the dacoits had kerosine oil lamps (diba alo) in their hands at the time of committing the dacoity and that the dacoits tied and beat him and his father and no other persons. Chaku does not mention the day on which the dacoity took place. Raghu says that it was on "Sunday last." The dacoity, according to the complainant, took place on Monday, the 2nd June, and the information was lodged next day (Tuesday) at 1 P. M. The dacoity having taken place on the midnight of Monday, one might possibly describe it as having taken place on Monday or Tuesday, but in no circumstance could it be said as having taken place on Sunday.

The complainant says that the dacoits wore galpattas with a view to concealing their faces. None of the accused make any mention of it.

Raghu Bhumij says that they distributed the booties of the dacoity on the bank of the Bandh in the forest of Kumir Kocha. Chaku says that the distribution took place near the bank of the Bankucha Bandh. The complainant in the first information says that in the morning of the dacoity he, with the Chaukidar and some persons of the village, went to the south up to the Bandh (tank) of Bara Paranmar tracing the footprints of the dacoits. We do not know whether these refer to the same place known by different names or whether they are different places. If they are different places the story of the distribution of the booty becomes very suspicious, still more if these Bandhs happen to be in different directions from the place of occurrence. Chaku Bhumij does not say where the dacoits collected together before going to the place of occurrence. Raghu Bhumij says that they all gathered in the house of Lohar Manjhi at village Kuchia. We do not know where this village Kuchia is and how far is it from the place of occurrence.

The prisoners named a number of persons as having taken part in the dacoity. Who these persons are, where they live, how they happened to collect together and proceeded to the place of occurrence have not at all been disclosed. The Police Officers contented themselves with having the confessions of these two persons and did not take them as a guide for investigating into the further details of the dacoity. These two accused persons could have been taken from place to place so as to give a clue to the history of the occurrence, how the dacoity was planned, how and when dacoits met together, the route taken by them and the incidents that happened in their nefarious journey to the place of occurrence and back till they dispersed and the parts played by each of them in these incidents. The confessions have not been tested or utilised. They are simply general statements that can fit in with any dacoity.

There is yet another important and, to my mind, the most fatal omission in both the confessions. Raghu does not name Chaku as being one of the dacoits and Chaku does not mention Raghu. If they have falsely concealed the names of each other, their confessions are tainted with falsehood. If, on the other hand, the omission of each other's name in their confessions is bona fide on account of either of them not having taken part in the dacoity, each of them is entitled to acquittal. In my view of the matter, the confessions of these accused persons cannot be acted upon The Court has to be satisfied as to the truth of the confessions, treating them as substantive evidence in the case, and hence the same test would apply to them as to the statements made by witnesses. Greater care is required when the confessions, as in this case, have been retracted, and I agree with the view taken in the case of Queen-Empress v. Maiku Lal (29), that "Where a confession is not supported by the evidence of the witnesses, a Judge must examine very carefully to see whether it gives those details which indicate that it is a natural narrative of what took place in the presence of the man making it and is not at variance with any evidence in the case which is believed, and is not merely a parrot-like repetition of a story put into the man's mouth."

Testing the confessions in the present case by the aforesaid test, I cannot feel convinced that the prisoners took part in the dacoity. They do not bear out the impression of truth. They do not appear to contain a true account of the prisoners' connection with the crime. No doubt, even a retracted confession, tested as above, may carry conviction to the mind of the Judge and be acted upon so far as the confessing prisoner is concerned. This is the reason why one looks for an independent and reliable evidence to corroborate a retracted confession on material particulars : vide Emperor v. Kehri (30), Guna Majhi v. Emperor (31), Jogjiban Ghose v. Emperor (32).

Both the Assessors, who heard the evidence in the case, have rejected the confessions as being unreliable. For the reasons given above, I have no hesitation in agreeing with them and with Mr. Justice Sultan Ahmed in acquitting the accused.

Although only Raghu has appealed, there is no more evidence against Chaku, who has not appealed, than against Raghu : rather the evidence against him is weaker than against Raghu, and his confession lacks much more in detail than that of Raghu.

While considering the case of Raghu, this Court is competent to set aside the conviction of Chaku as well, as laid down in Broja Rakhal Mozumdar v. Empress (33), Queen v. Joffur Ali (34), Queen-Empress v. Karam Ali (35), Queen-Empress v. Ratan Singh (36) and Bachinta v. Emperor (37).

The result is that the convictions of and the sentences passed against both the accused, Raghu Bhumij and Chaku Bhumij, are set aside.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—In this case the accused Nos. 1 and 2 have been convicted of a breach of rule 2 framed by the Local Government under section 75, clause (c), of the Indian Forest Act. The breach consisted in the accused Nos. 1 and 2 having cut certain sandalwood trees grown on their occupancy number. Both under the rule as well as under the clause of the section under which the rule is framed it is necessary for the prosecution to establish that the trees said to have been cut belonged to Government or were the property of Government. In the present case the occupancy was granted many years ago and it is not disputed that the sandalwood trees in question came into existence long after the first survey settlement. Whatever the respective ages of these trees might be, it is not disputed that in no case did the age exceed sixteen years. The trial Magistrate decided the case on the footing that the sandalwood trees were among the reserved trees. The reference to this Court is made on that assumption and the case is argued before us on that basis. Under section 40 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code all the trees except those that are reserved would belong to the occupant. The learned Government Pleader has relied upon the second paragraph of the section for the purpose of making it clear that in the case of Settlements prior to the passing of Bombay Act I of 1865 the right to teak, blackwood and sandalwood trees was not conceded to the occupants. The first survey settlement in this village is stated before us to have been made prior to the passing of this Act, and the revision survey settlement was made after the passing of the Land Revenue Code. It may be taken that the sandalwood trees were among the reserved trees.

Proceeding on that footing it seems to me that the question is whether the reservation would apply to the trees existing at the date of the first settlement or to all subsequent growths. Rule 93, clause (vii), of the Rules framed under section 214 provides that when the right of Government to the trees in a survey number has been once disposed of to the occupant or when all the reserved trees have been once cut and removed, theGovernment will have no further claim to trees which may otherwise grow in the number or which may spring up from the old roots or stumps so long as the land continues in occupation. This rule makes it clear that all the reserved trees may be cut and removed, and that after they are cut and removed, the Government has no further right to such trees growing in the occupancy number so long as the occupancy continues. We do not know in this case, for instance, whether there were any sandalwood trees originally on this survey number at the date of the Settlement and whether they were cut or not. If any such trees existed originally, they must have been cut and removed, as the trees in question were comparatively recent growths, and as it is not suggested that there is any old tree on the number. Assuming, however, as suggested by the Government Pleader, that there were no such trees at the date of the grant and that there never has been any previous cutting of sandalwood trees in this occupancy number by the Government, the question is whether the sandalwood trees which have admittedly grown on the land during the occupation of the land and after the date of the Settlement belong to the occupant or to the Government. It seems to me that rule 93 indicates that the right of the Government is confined to reserved trees existing at the date of the Settlement and that all subsequent growths belong to the occupant. This view of rule 93 appears to me to be consistent with the terms of section 40 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code and to indicate the true meaning of that section. Apart from this rule, there is nothing in the language of section 40 of the Code to show that all future growths of sandalwood trees or rather of reserved trees would belong to the Government.

The language would apply ordinarily to existing growths of reserved trees at the date of the Settlement : and the doubt, if any, is removed by the wording of rule 93, which clearly indicates the meaning of the section in that sense. The plain and natural meaning of the rule is that the existing reserved trees belong to the Government, and that all future growths belong to the occupant. Thus the trees in question, which are not shown to have been in existence at the date of the Settlement, belong to the occupant. I have referred to the date of the Settlement, as we are concerned with a case in which the Settlement was completed prior to the passing of the Land Revenue Code.

This is an important question, and it may be that all the material facts are not brought out clearly in these proceedings. But considering the case on the materials available on this record, I do not think that these trees, for the cutting whereof the accused have been convicted, are shown to be the property of the Government. Therefore, in my opinion, there was no breach of the rule under the Indian Forest Act.

I would, therefore, make the Rule absolute, set aside the convictions and sentences and direct the fines, if paid, to be refunded.

HAYWARD, J.—I concur. Accused Nos. 1 and 2 cut certain sandalwood trees on their land. It seems to have been assumed that these trees were growths subsequent to the occupancy but it has not been clearly shown that they were not fresh growths from old stumps. The accused Nos. 1 and 2 were, however, fined for having cut the trees on the ground that they had in any case been reserved as the property of Government under rule 2 published at page 59 of the First Part of the Bombay Government Gazette for 1883 under section 75 of the Indian Forest Act.

It has been stated that the Original Settlement was in the year 1855 and the Revised Settlement in 1888-89, and it has been urged that as the Original Settlement was before 1865 all sandalwood trees, whether grown subsequently or merely fresh growths from old stumps, were reserved by reason of section 40 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code and that even if the Revision Settlement of 1888-89 be looked to, still there was a special reservation covering both within the meaning of section 40 under rule 91, clause (1), notwithstanding the provisions of rule 93, clause (vii) of the same rules under section 214 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code.

It has not, however, been shown to my satisfaction that the reservations were ever intended to cover growths subsequent to the Survey Settlements. It would, in my opinion, be contrary to the ordinary rule of construction to apply the reservation to anything that was not then in existence. There would, in my opinion, have been a special clause if it had been intended by the reservation to include trees that might be grown on the land subsequent to the Survey Settlements and there would have been explicit reference to such growth in rule 93, clause (vii), under section 214 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code. It seems to me, therefore, that the prosecution has not established the liability of the opponents to fine under section 75 of the Indian Forest Act. It seems to me unfortunate that where there was a doubt of this nature as to the intention of the rules, the prosecution should have been lodged and that a matter of this importance should have been left for determination upon insufficient materials in an unrepresented proceeding in a Criminal Court. It would more properly have been determined by regular proceedings in the Civil Court.

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 44 OF 1920.

March 16, 1920.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 476, order under—Preliminary inquiry, whether necessary—Procedure.

Although the holding of an inquiry preliminary to the passing of an order under section 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code is discretionary, yet, when such an inquiry is started, whether it be a formal or informal inquiry, the Court should carry the investigation to completion, in order that the person affected may have a full opportunity of showing cause why he should not be prosecuted. [p. 65, col. 1.]

Criminal revision against an order, dated 10th January 1920, of the Sessions Judge, Muzafferpur, directing the prosecution of the petitioner under section 174 of the Indian Penal Code.

Mr. Jogindra Nath Maitra, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.

JWALA PRASAD, J.—(February 11, 1920).—This is an application against an order of the Sessions Judge of Muzafferpur passed under section 476 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, directing the prosecution of the petitioner for an offence under section 174, Indian Penal Code.

The petitioner was a witness in a case committed to the Court of Session, and he was summoned by the commitment Court to appear on the 10th January at 10 A. M. before the Sessions Judge in order to give evidence at the trial of the case. He did not appear at the time fixed in the summons, but he actually appeared at 12 noon. The Sessions Judge examined the petitioner and then passed an order directing his prosecution and forwarded him to the Magistrate for his trial under section 174, Indian Penal Code.

All conceivable objections appear to have been taken by the petitioner attacking the legality of the procedure in making the order under section 476 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. All these objections, however, appear to be without any foundation.

The first objection related to the legality of the summons itself. It was urged that the Magistrate, who issued the summons requiring the petitioner to appear before the Sessions Judge, had no authority under the Code of Criminal Procedure to issue the summons. It is an elementary principle that the prosecution is bound to produce all the evidence before the Court of Session, and it is the duty of the Magistrate to see that all the evidence is produced. This duty is enjoined both in respect of witnesses on behalf of the prosecution and those on behalf of the accused. As regards the latter, section 256 is a clear provision. As regards the former, under section 217 the Magistrate is required to take bonds from the complainant, his witnesses, as well as the witnesses for the defence, who appear before him, binding them to be in attendance, when called upon, at the Court of Session or the High Court to prosecute or give evidence, as the case may be. No doubt, the word "summons" is not used therein, but it is obviously included within the words "called upon". The latter expression has been made comprehensive enough to enable the Magistrate to enforce attendance of the witnesses in any way that he thinks expedient by written summons, verbal message, or deputation of an officer of the Court. It is absurd to suppose that the duty cast upon the Magistrate to produce witnesses should be without any power vested in him to discharge that duty by compelling the attendance of witnesses by notice or summons or warrant, as the case may be. I, therefore, overrule this objection.

The next objection that the summons did not state that the accused were already committed needs only a passing reference. Under section 174, Indian Penal Code, the offence is complete, if the accused does not appear in response to a summons legally served upon him and issued by a competent authority.

The third objection is equally frivolous, namely, that the summons is illegal, as it purports to have been issued under section 252 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. That section relates to summons in warrant cases. There is no other form prescribed in the Code for summons on witnesses to appear at the Sessions trial, and according to the report of the Magistrate, the form prescribed for a warrant case is in practice used for a Sessions trial as well.

Even if there was any irregularity in the aforesaid matters, the order under section 476 would not be ultra vires inasmuch as upon the summons in the case there was a clear specification of the time and place for the petitioner to appear and that the summons was issued by a public servant, who was competent to issue the same.

The learned Vakil on behalf of the petitioner has also urged that upon merits the explanation given by him for not appearing at the time fixed in the summons should have been accepted by the Sessions Judge, or, at least, an enquiry should have been held by him before directing the prosecution of the petitioner. Section 476 itself does not provide for any inquiry preliminary to the order made, though in some cases it is desirable that an enquiry should be made. It all depends upon the nature of each case.

It, however, appears that after the petitioner appeared at 12 noon he was examined by the learned Sessions Judge, and the questions and answers were recorded under the heading "examination of Ajodhya Prasad." The petitioner contends that he was examined after the Judge had contemplated an action under section 476 and that he could not be examined otherwise than under section 242 of the Code, relating to the examination of an accused person, and hence the examination of the petitioner at that stage by the Judge vitiated the order made by him directing the prosecution of the petitioner. The learned Sessions Judge does not refer to the examination of the accused in his order under section 476, nor is it stated in the order as to why the explanation given by the petitioner for coming to Court late was not accepted. In order, therefore, to dispose of the contention of the petitioner, it is necessary to ascertain at what stage and under what circumstances the petitioner was examined, whether the prosecution case was closed, and whether the evidence of the petitioner was material at the Sessions trial. If so, why was he not examined as a witness in the case, when he actually did appear, though late? The learned Sessions Judge is, therefore, requested to favour us with a report upon the above points and also upon the allegations made in paragraphs 5 and 7 of the application of the petitioner to this Court. The record of the Sessions case, in which the petitioner was cited as a witness, may also be forwarded to this Court, along with such other papers as bear upon the failure of petitioner to attend the Court.

The case will be taken up on receipt of the report and the papers from the learned Sessions Judge.

FINAL JUDGMENT.—In the report now received the learned Sessions Judge says that he examined the petitioner informally in his capacity of a witness, who had attended late, before he drew up proceedings under section 476 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The learned Sessions Judge directed prosecution of the petitioner, because he was not satisfied with the explanation given by him.

The order of the Sessions Judge under section 476 of the Code is, therefore, based upon the statement made by the petitioner in what is called by the Sessions Judge an informal examination of the petitioner. The object of the examination of the petitioner was, therefore, to find out the reasons why he came late. The reasons were stated by the petitioner, namely, that his grandson was sick and that he was delayed in looking after him. Having embarked on an enquiry as to the cause of the petitioner having come late, the petitioner, to my mind, should have been given an opportunity of substantiating his reasons. Section 476, no doubt, makes it discretionary with the Court to make any preliminary enquiry that may be necessary. But when an enquiry is, as a matter of fact, started, whether it be a formal or informal enquiry, it should, in my opinion, be completed. The learned Sessions Judge, therefore, should not have stopped short at the examination of the petitioner but should have carried on the investigation and given in this particular case, as will be presently shown, a full opportunity to the petitioner to show cause why he should not have been prosecuted. The statements made in the examination are in answer to questions put by the Sessions Judge and may not, at first sight, appear to be convincing. A detailed statement made as cause shown might possibly have satisfied the learned Sessions Judge as to there being sufficient excuse for the petitioner to come late. In the sworn petition filed in this Court the petitioner states in paragraphs 2 and 3 that when he returned from his Vakil in the morning, after finishing his own business, he stopped on his way to see his own grandson, who was seriously ill of pneumonia and that he was impelled by a sense of imperative duty to make arrangements for his nursing and treatment. He also attaches a medical certificate of the Sub-Assistant Surgeon of Muzafferpore in proof of the fact that on that morning his grandson was suffering from pneumonia and was under his medical treatment. On the other hand, there does not appear to be any motive for the petitioner to have intentionally avoided coming to Court at the proper time. The accused in the Sessions case was arrested by the Head Constable, while trying to dispose of, in suspicious circumstances, a stolen copper pitcher. The petitioner, along with others, was a witness to this matter. The learned Sessions Judge admits that besides the petitioner there were other material witnesses in the case, whose evidence, if accepted, was sufficient for the disposal of this case and, as a matter of fact, the case was disposed of upon the evidence of those witnesses and the absence of the petitioner did not affect the trial of the case. The fact that he did actually appear in Court, though late, goes to show that there was no intention, on the part of the petitioner, to avoid attending the Sessions Court. His coming late might be due either, as he states, to the illness of his grandson or to laziness, or to both together. The Sessions Judge, who was trying the Sessions case in which the petitioner was summoned as a witness, was by far the best person to judge whether the petitioner had committed the offence or not and also as to the amount of the criminality of the petitioner, in order to determine what punishment would have met the ends of justice. The learned Sessions Judge has now seen himself that the proper course in a case of this kind is that indicated by section 477 and not section 476 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. I would, therefore, set aside, as now recommended by the Sessions Judge, his order under section 476 and would have directed him to dispose of the case under section 477 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, but for the circumstances, indicated above, which show the chances of conviction of the petitioner to be practically nil; besides, had the learned Sessions Judge himself dealt with the case under section 477, the matter would have been disposed of quickly without much harassment to the petitioner. The petitioner has already suffered a good deal in coming to this Court and has thus been amply punished for having appeared late in Court.

The Rule is, therefore, made absolute.

Execution of decree—Instalment decree—Clause benefiting judgment-debtor not taken advantage of, effect of—Default in payment of instalment—Waiver.

Where there is a provision in a decree for the benefit of the judgment-debtor and he fails to take advantage of the benefit which is provided for him, he loses that benefit and the decree automatically becomes a decree of the ordinary type which does not offer that benefit. [p. 66, col. 2.]

A decree provided for the payment of a certain sum by way of interest every year, and for the payment of the principal on the expiration of twenty-five years, but if the interest was not paid in any year, then the principal and interest could be recovered at once in one sum For several years there was default in the payment of interest and both parties continued to believe that the original decree still subsisted. Eventually the decree-holder applied for execution of the decree for principal and interest purporting to take advantage of the last default in the payment of interest:

Held, that the parties must be taken to have mutually condoned and wiped out all previous defaults and that the legal position was that there had been only one default which was the subject-matter of the application and that, therefore, the decree-holder was entitled to recover the principal and one year's interest [p 67, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—In this case a decree was passed in favour of the plaintiff on the 12th February 1894. It directed that interest should be recovered at the rate of Rs. 262-8-0 per annum before the 31st of May every year from 1892, and that the principal amount Rs. 7,001 should be recovered in twenty five years. It farther directed that if the judgment-debtors obstructed the judgment-creditor in attaching the cash allowance till his principal was paid or obstructed the judgment-creditor in getting his interest every year till the principal was paid or obstructed him in any other way or if the judgment creditor did not get the interest every year from the judgment-debtors, the judgment-creditor should recover the whole amount, principal and interest, with interest at $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. by sale of the mortgaged cash allowance. The judgment-debtors made default in payment of annual instalments of interest. Execution was taken out, and it appears that Rs. 171 2-6 had been recovered in 1903, and Rs. 165 0-3 in 1908. A Darkhast was issued in 1909, but that was struck off without anything being paid. Again, in 1914, the decree having been transferred to the Nasik Court for execution, a Darkhast was issued, but as no money was lying in the office of the Mamlatdar of Niphad the Darkhast was dismissed on the 17th July 1914. It was never up to that time suggested that the judgment-creditor was barred from executing his decree because he had not taken advantage of the default clause. The present Darkhast was issued in 1916 praying for execution for the whole amount, principal and interest.

The Darkhast was dismissed by the trial Judge on the ground that the principal had not become due, that only three years' interest was recoverable, but that had not been claimed. The Judge said that the parties were at liberty to open the whole contentions again if the judgment creditor filed a new Darkhast, and, if it was filed, in the Court's opinion for a proper amount. The judgment does not appear to be consistent, nor does it appear whether it proceeded on the same argument as found favour with this Court in the case of Raichand v. Dhondo (1). It does not seem that the Judge was of the opinion that the judgment-creditor was barred entirely from executing the decree because he had not taken advantage of the default clause. He merely said that the principal had not become due, and it was open to the judgment-creditor to execute for the interest so far as the law of limitation allowed him.

Now, it is quite possible that on the facts of a particular case the judgment-

creditor may be barred, if it is considered by the Court that he was barred from executing his decree because on a default being made in the payment of an instalment under the decree, he had not executed for the whole amount within three years under the power given to him by the decree. But I think there may be cases, and I think this is one, where the parties may agree, either directly or indirectly, that although default has been made in the payment of an instalment, still the judgment-creditor would not be bound to execute for the whole amount within the time allowed by the law of limitation. Instead of that, it is open to the parties to agree that the instalment should be taken as having been paid and if future default were made execution should issue for the instalments from the date of such default in arrears. Now, this is what appears to have been done by the parties in this case. Execution proceedings were taken from time to time in order to get payment of the instalments of interest directed to be paid by the decree. It was never suggested, although defaults appear to have been made from the very commencement, that after three years from the date of first default, as no execution proceedings had been taken for the whole amount, the judgment-creditor was absolutely barred from executing his decree, and up till 1914 the parties proceeded on this footing that the judgment creditor was executing as far as possible for the instalments, and was not attempting to take advantage of the clause which enabled him to execute for the whole amount, and that was argeed to by the judgment-debtor. Clearly, in 1914, it was open to him to take the point that execution was barred absolutely. Instead of doing that, he only took the objection that execution could not proceed because there were no assets in the Nasik Court which could be paid out under the Darkhast. Therefore, I think it was open in this case to the judgment-creditor to treat all the instalments previous to the last one, before the Darkhast of 1916 was issued, as having been paid, and then to consider that the default in payment of the last instalment entitled him to proceed to execute for the whole amount, that is to say, the principal amount and the last instalment of interest which had not been paid. It would then be open to the judgment-debtor to say, "you have agreed in the past to waive the default clause, and only to execute for the instalments until the twenty-five years are up when the principal amount of Rs. 7,001 becomes due." But that contention has not been raised. All that I can gather from the previous conduct of the parties, is that it was conceded that the judgment-creditor should not be barred absolutely from executing the decree merely because he had sought to execute the decree for the instalments in arrears. It seems to me that it was open to him after 1914, when continued default in the payment of interest was made, to take advantage of the decree and execute for that instalment which was in arrears and for the principal amount. To that extent I should allow the appeal with costs in proportion. The cross-objections are dismissed with costs.

HEATON, J.—I need not recapitulate the facts which have been stated by my Lord, the Chief Justice. I propose to follow in this case the principle which I set out in my judgment in the case of Raichand v. Dhondo (1) that where you have, as in this decree, a provision for the benefit of the judgment-debtor, and where the judgment-debtor fails to take advantage of the benefit which is provided for him, then he loses that benefit, and the decree automatically becomes a decree of the ordinary type which does not offer that benefit. This is not a case of an instalment decree of the usual kind. It provides for the payment of a certain sum by way of interest every year, and for the payment of the principal on the expiration of twenty five years, but if the interest is not paid in any year then the principal and interest in one sum are to be at once recovered. So any failure to pay interest for one year would automatically convert the decree into one under which the principal was immediately recoverable. Now, in this case, there has been year after year for a long series of years a failure to pay the interest, and, therefore, it is urged that, many years ago, the decree automatically became one of the ordinary type. The principal, it is urged, was then recoverable and limitation has by this time made it quite impossible to recover it.

But it does not follow that because the decree holder is entitled to interest every year, therefore, he is bound to take it. He may be a generous man and he may forego it. He may let year after year go by without troubling his debtor about the interest. That would not automatically convert the decree into a decree of the ordinary type. That, however, is not what has happened in this case. But just as you may have a judgment-creditor generously refraining from taking his yearly interest, so you may have the judgment-creditor and the debtor both agreeing that a default shall be condoned, and that the decree shall continue as an instalment decree or a decree of the kind that we have here. My Lord, the Chief Justice, has pointed out circumstances in this case which enable us to arrive at this position. We regard the judgment-creditor and the judgment-debtor as having mutually condoned all defaults prior to the one which is the subject of the particular Darkhast. In other words, we take it that both agreed, as undoubtedly they both believed, that the decree which still existed between them was the original decree. As I began by saying, I need not detail the facts. No doubt both parties have totally misunderstood the true legal effect of the decree between them. But, equally undoubtedly, they have both treated it as a decree still subsisting in the shape of a decree which requires interest to be paid for twenty-five years, and thereafter the principal. And, although their conduct has been no doubt influenced by mutual misunderstanding of the true legal nature of the decree, yet still we can accept this: that they both believed the decree to be still in force between them, and I think we may also take it that we may accept it as establishing a position equivalent to what would be the true legal position, had they acted similarly with full knowledge of the true nature of the decree. The legal effect is this, that there has been in effect no default at all except the one which is the subject of the Darkhast. Every previous default is wiped out. You cannot take it that there has been a default previously which enables the judgment creditor to claim interest for the previous years, but that this default has not had the effect of automatically converting the decree into one of the ordinary type. If there has been an uncondoned default, then the legal consequences of that default must ensue. Therefore, in order that the present Darkhast may be acceded to, we must take it that there has been no default whatever except the one which is the subject-matter of this Darkhast, and although as a matter of fact many previous defaults have occurred, they are all to be regarded as condoned or wiped out, and we are to deal with this decree as if it had been fulfilled in every particular until the failure to pay that item of interest which led to the present Darkhast. That being so, what the judgment creditor is entitled to is one year's interest and the principal. Therefore, I agree to the order proposed by my Lord, the Chief Justice.

LAHORE HIGH COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 510 OF 1919.

May 21, 1919.

Present:—Mr. Justice Bevan-Petman.

JOHRI—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT

JOWAHRA AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS,

Appeal, second—Appellate Court, failure of, to decide question raised and put in issue, effect of—Document relied on by Appellate Court—Document not tendered in evidence and not on record—Error of law—Construction of deeds relating to land—Variation between measurements and plan.

Where an Appellate Court fails to consider or decide a question which is specifically raised and put in issue, its decision is liable to be set aside in second appeal. And where an Appellate Court bases its judgment upon a document which is not, and never was, on the record at the first hearing of the case and was neither mentioned nor relied on and which has not been proved, admitted, tendered, or placed on the record, it commits an error of law. [p. 68, col 1.]

Where in deeds relating to land there is a variation between measurements and plans it is a well-recognised principle of construction that reliance should ordinarily be placed on the latter. [p. 68, col. 2.]

JOHRI v. JOWAHRA.

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Karnal, dated the 22nd January 1919, reversing that of the Munsif, 1st Class, Rohtak, dated the 5th August 1918.

Lala Shamair Chand, for the Appellants.

Bakhshi Tek Chand, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The findings of the first Court were that the plaintiffs had failed to prove that the area marked A on a plan was joint property, that in any case the plaintiffs had acquiesced in the building and waived their rights, that the wall B was not the exclusive property of the plaintiffs and that the defendants had not diverted a drain. The Court, therefore, refused the injunction claimed and dismissed the suit. The lower Appellate Court reversed these findings in respect of the area A, the wall B and the drain, but failed to consider or decide the questions of acquiescence and waiver which had been specifically raised and put in issue. It further failed to consider whether it should, in view of the facts that the plaintiffs had raised no objection to the construction of the building and had slept over their alleged wrongs for some years, exercise its discretional powers to grant the relief claimed. But it is unnecessary to deal further with these failures as the finding of the lower Appellate Court in respect of the area A must be set aside. The finding is based on two grounds; first, the contents of an alleged mortgage in the record of another case and, second, that the admitted discharge of water on to the area A proves that the defendant did not have exclusive ownership of it. But it is obvious that the discharge of water can be attributed to an easement and the proper inference has not been drawn. There are more serious objections to the first ground. It appears that the document relied on is only a copy. It is not, and never was, on the record at the first hearing of the case; it was neither mentioned, nor relied on. The defendant had applied, under Order XIII, rule 10 of the Code, that the record of another case be sent for but the document was not proved, admitted, tendered or placed on the record. Order XIII, rule 10 expressly provides as follows :—"Nothing contained in this rule shall be deemed to enable the Court to use in evidence any document which under the law of evidence would be inadmissible in the suit." The judgment in Bibi Putli v Jowala Devi (1), which related to a case in which the record sent for itself related to a case between the same parties, is further authority, if any were needed, for holding that, under the circumstances, the lower Appellate Court erred in law in referring to, or relying on, the alleged copy of the mortgage.

But even had that mortgage deed been proved and admitted in evidence, it is clear that the lower Appellate Court has drawn entirely wrong inferences from it. A glance at the map attached to the document and forming part of it shows that the area A was included in the mortgage. The area mortgaged excluding the part marked A actually measures 172 square yards, but is described in the deed as 'about or estimated at' 120 square yards. If the area, excluding A, did, as a matter of fact, amount to no more than about 120 square yards, there would be force in the arguments of the lower Appellate Court, but when there is such a great variance, a matter of another 27 square yards is a matter of no importance, on the other hand, it is a well-recognized principle of construction of deeds relating to land in cases of variation between measurements and plans that reliance should ordinarily be placed on the latter.

The judgment of the lower Appellate Court admittedly cannot be maintained in respect of the findings relating to the wall B and the diversion of the drain. No evidence is referred to and no reasons are given.

I, therefore, accept the appeal, set aside the judgment and decree of the lower Appellate Court and hold that the plaintiffs have failed to prove that they are the owners of the area A, and I remand the case to the lower Appellate Court and direct it to dispose of the remainder of the appeal in its Court according to law. I may note that if it finds that the wall belongs exclusively to the plaintiffs it should also decide whether, under the circumstances of the case, it should grant the relief prayed and, if so, to what extent, or whether any compensation should be paid, or whether the plaintiffs had lost even the right to any compensation. It follows from this judgment that the rights of the plaintiffs, if any, in respect of the drain amounted to an easement and the point should be borne in mind when dealing with the question of the alleged diversion of the drain.

The costs of this appeal shall be paid by the respondents.

Case remanded.

It was provided in a lease that on a breach of the covenant to pay the stipulated rent the landlord would have the right to put an end to the lease. The tenant failed to pay the stipulated rent but paid the standard rent under section 9 of the Bombay Rent (War Restrictions) Act. The landlord brought a suit to enforce his right of re-entry on the ground that there was a breach of the covenant to pay the stipulated rent:

Held, (1) that the right of re-entry on failure to pay the stipulated rent was an auxiliary provision to secure the payment of rent [p. 7, col. 2.]

(2) that the Legislature having by the provisions of the Bombay Rent (War Restrictions) Act cut down the stipulated rent and enacted that the standard rent was the only rent that the tenant was bound to pay the right of re-entry could be made available only for the purpose of securing the payment of standard rent; [p. 71, col. 2.]

(3) that the standard rent having been paid, the right of re-entry could not be enforced. [p. 72, col. 1.]

The mere fact that a landlord waives his right to forfeit a lease on a breach of the covenant to pay rent in respect of any particular month or months does not destroy his right to forfeit on similar breaches in subsequent months. [p. 70, col. 2.]

The mere presentation of a plaint in a suit for ejectment on the ground of forfeiture of the lease is a conclusive declaration of intention to determine the lease. [p. 71, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

SETALVAD, J.—The plaintiffs, who are merchants and mill agents doing extensive business, have their office in a building situated in Church Gate Street in the city of Bombay, which building has been acquired by the Municipality for the purpose of widening the said Street and the Municipality have asked the plaintiffs to vacate the said building. On the correspondence between the plaintiffs and the Municipality, the situation appears to be that the plaintiffs are in their present office on sufferance and are under an obligation to vacate on a fortnight's notice from the Municipality. The plaintiffs are owners of a building situated at Esplanade Road in the city of Bombay. A portion of the second floor of this building is occupied by the defendant in Suit No. 3671 of 1919 who is an Attorney of this Court, for the purposes of his office, and the rest of the said floor is occupied by the defendant in Suit No. 3672 of 1919 for the purposes of his College of Commerce. The defendants have been tenants of the plaintiffs for many years. In the beginning of the year 1918 the defendants who were then paying Rs. 250 each as monthly rent, offered to take a lease for three years from the beginning of February 1918 of the portions of the said premises occupied respectively by them for a monthly rent of Rs. 400 to be paid by each of them and the said offer was accepted by the plaintiffs. The leases were, however, not actually executed till the 3rd of July 1918. During the interval, the Bombay Rent (War Restrictions) Act, II of 1918, came into force on the 10th of April 1918. The defendants did not pay any rent between the date of the agreement to lease and the actual execution of the leases. Although they had each offered to pay Rs. 400 as the monthly rent and had induced the plaintiffs to agree to give them a lease on that footing, they decided to take advantage of the provisions of the Rent Act but kept discreetly quiet from February to July and did not manifest their intention to do so, because they evidently apprehended that if the plaintiffs realised that the defendants were not going to pay the rent agreed upon, they might in some way decline to give the defendants the leases. But, soon after, the leases were executed on the 3rd of July and they were secure in their tenancy for three years, the defendants on the 23rd of July 1918 sent to the plaintiffs the amount of the rent for February to June 1918 inclusive calculated at the rate of Rs. 275 in each case, being the standard rent payable under the Rent Act. The plaintiffs received the amounts so sent by the defendants without prejudice to their rights and remedies under the respective leases. After that, for the rent for the months of July and August the plaintiffs themselves made out bills at the rate of Rs. 275 in each case and on presentation the same were paid by the defendants. The plaintiffs, by their Attorneys' letter of 20th September 1918, informed the defendants that by their failure to pay Rs. 400, the rent reserved under the leases, they had committed a breach of their covenant to pay the said rent and that the plaintiffs had, by virtue of the provision in that behalf in the said leases, determined the said leases and were, therefore, entitled to re enter upon the premises which, it was stated, they required for their own use and occupation and called upon the defendants to vacate the said premises. Further correspondence ensued between the parties, in which the plaintiffs maintained their right to determine the leases and the defendants denied such right. No bills were made out and presented by the plaintiffs for the rent for the month of September 1918 but, in the course of the correspondence above referred to, the defendants offered rent at the rate of Rs. 275 each for September and the same was accepted by the plaintiff's without prejudice to their rights and contentions on the 8th October 1919. Rent for the months of October and November 1919 was offered by the defendants at the rate of Rs. 275 but the plaintiffs declined to accept the same saying that they had already determined the leases. On the 12th of December 1919 the present suits were filed by the plaintiffs praying for possession of the premises and for damages for wrongful occupation by the defendants. It appears from the above facts, which are undisputed, that the plaintiffs, by their act in making out the rent bills for the months of July and August at the rate of Rs. 275 per month and accepting the said rent, waived their right to forfeit the leases by reason of non-payment of the stipulated rent. But that does not preclude them from treating the non-payment by the defendants of the rent for September at the stipulated rate as a breach of the covenant of the lease in that behalf as the non-payment of rent at the stipulated rate month after month was a continuing breach. Their having waived their right to forfeit on such a breach for any particular month or months does not destroy their right to forfeit on similar breaches in subsequent months. The rent for September at the rate of Rs. 275 was, as already stated, accepted without prejudice. The rent for October and November tendered by the defendants was not accepted by the plaintiffs. In paragraph 5 of the plaint the facts about the payment of rent from July to September are set out and in paragraph 6 it is stated that, by reason of the failure of the defendants to pay the stipulated rent, the plaintiffs had become entitled to re enter. Paragraph 10 refers to the plaintiffs' letter of the 20th September 1919 determining the lease and paragraph 11 says that the lease had become forfeited and determined. The failure to pay the stipulated rent for October and November has not been specifically set out in the plaints but such failure is admitted. And I think it is open to the plaintiffs to rely on such failure to establish their claim to determine the lease as claimed in paragraph 6 of the plaints [Penton v. Barnett (1)]. An application was made at the hearing by the plaintiffs for leave to amend the plaint by setting out at the end of paragraph 5 of the plaint the failure to pay the stipulated rent for the months of October and November 1919. I do not think, in view of the admitted facts of the case, it is necessary to amend the plaint. But if I had considered it necessary I would have allowed the amendment. The additional facts sought to be pleaded by the proposed amendment are admitted and do not come as a surprise on the defendants. It was contended that, even if the plaintiffs are allowed to rely upon the failure by the defendants to pay the stipulated rent for October and November 1919, that would not avail them as they had not declared their intention to determine the lease by reason of such failure, but the presentation of the plaints is, I think, a conclusive declaration of intention to determine the lease [Serjeant v. Nash, Field & Co. (2).]

But the real and substantial question in these suits is, whether the payment by each of the defendants of Rs. 275, being the standard rent under the Rent Act, instead of Rs. 400, the stipulated rent, is a breach of the covenant in the leases to pay the said stipulated rent. Section 2 of the Act defines the expression "standard rent," and section 3 enacts that, when the rent of any premises has been or is increased above the standard rent, the excess of the rent payable over the standard rent shall be irrecoverable, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary. Section 12 enacts that, where any sum has been paid on account of rent, being a sum irrecoverable as aforesaid, such sum shall, under certain restrictions as to time, be recoverable by the tenant from the landlord and may be deducted by the tenant from future rent payable by him. It is true that the Act does not make the payment by the tenant of the stipulated rent, being in excess of the standard rent, illegal, and does not purport to affect the contract between the parties contained in the lease regarding the right of the lessor to determine the lease on failure to pay the stipulated rent, although a landlord seeking possession of the premises on such determination will, under section 9, be not decreed possession unless he brings himself within the proviso to that section. There is nothing in the Act to prevent the tenant from paying the stipulated rent and thus preventing determination of the lease. And, it is contended, if he does not choose to do so, he cannot prevent the determination of the lease but that he can claim only the limited protection that section 9 affords to a tenant whose tenancy has expired, and that, therefore, if the landlord requires the premises reasonably and bona fide for his own occupation the tenant, who has failed to pay the stipulated rent and thereby brought about the forfeiture of the lease, must give up the premises or avoid the forfeiture by complying with the provisions of section 114 of the Transfer of Property Act by payment of the stipulated rent, interest and costs. If this were the correct legal position, it will enable the landlord to determine the lease for the failure of the tenant to pay the excess rent which the Rent Act makes irrecoverable and which the tenant is not bound to pay and thus, ultimately, compel the tenant to pay the said excess in order to avoid forfeiture of the lease by availing himself of the provisions of section 114 of the Transfer of Property Act; and it is extremely doubtful whether a tenant, under these circumstances, paying the excess rent through the intervention of the Court can recover it back under section 12 of the Rent Act. This would wholly defeat the object of the Rent Act. Moreover, it would be open to the tenant to pay to the landlord the rent stipulated under the lease and thus fulfil the covenant to pay that rent, and then, under section 12 of the Rent Act, recover back the excess so paid. If it is open to him to do so, it is difficult to say that he commits a breach of the covenant by paying the standard rent in the first instance. The right of re-entry on failure to pay the stipulated rent is an auxiliary provision to secure the payment of rent [Howard v Fanshawe (3)]. The Legislature by the Rent Act has cut down the stipulated rent and enacted that the standard rent is the only rent that the tenant is bound to pay. When, therefore, the principal obligation is thus modified by reducing the stipulated rent, it is difficult to hold that the auxiliary provision to secure the payment of the whole amount of the stipulated rent is still left unaffected. In my opinion this auxiliary right is, after the passing of the Rent Act, available only for the purpose of securing the payment of the rent which is payable under the law, viz, the standard rent. I am fortified in the view I have taken by the judgment of Scrutton, J., in Durell v. Gread (4), where that learned Judge held that the right of re entry consequent on the failure of the tenant to pay rent by reason of his taking advantage of the provisions of the Postponement of Payments Act, 1914, was destroyed by the postponement of the due date of payment of the rent.

Even if the plaintiffs' right to determine the leases is held to be unaffected, the defendants are entitled to be relieved of the forfeiture under section 114 of the Transfer of Property Act on payment of rent, interest and costs, and that they have offered to do by their written statement. But, in the view I have taken, it is not necessary for them to invoke in their favour the provisions of that section.

That being the position, it is not necessary to go into the question whether the plaintiffs require the premises bona fide for their own occupation within the meaning of the proviso to section 9 of the Rent Act. But I think there is no doubt on the evidence that the premises are so required by the plaintiffs. I hold that the tenancy has not been validly terminated and the plaintiffs are not entitled to eject the defendants. The result is that the suits must be dismissed with costs.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Mortgage by one member of family, whether binding on others—Necessity and antecedent debt, absence of—Mortgagee, position and remedies of—Partition—Intention to separate, proof of—Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 32—Horoscope, admissibility of, in evidence.

A mortgage of the whole or a share of the joint family property of a Mitakshara family by one member of the family, unless justified by legal necessity or by an antecedent debt or assented to by the other members of the family is void and inoperative as against the property hypothecated and gives the mortgagee no rights even against the mortgagor's undivided share. Where, however, the mortgagor's interest has been separated from that of the other members of the family actual partition by metes and bounds not being essential for this purpose, or where the share has by legal process been attached or sold at the instance of the creditor it may become available as security for the mortgage-debt. In special circumstances, where the property has already passed into the hands of the mortgagee, the Court, if satisfied that the equities of the case require it, may, in its discretion, set aside the alienation upon the terms that the property when restored shall be held in separate shares, the share of the mortgagor being subject to a lien for the mortgage-debt and interest. [p. 78, col. 2.]

An intention on the part of a mortgagor of family property to separate from the rest of the family cannot, however, be inferred from the terms of the mortgage bond itself where it purports to hypothecate only the mortgagor's interest in the family property. [p. 7-, col. 2.]

Statements as to age, made by deceased persons in the circumstances contemplated in section 3' of the Act, are admissible in evidence. [p. 79, col 2.]

A horoscope, therefore, prepared by a deceased person is admissible in evidence, under section 32 of the Evidence Act, to prove a person's age. [p. 79, cols. 1 & 2.]

Appeal from a decision of the Subordinate Judge of Palamau.

JUDGMENT.

MILLER, C. J.—These two appeals arise out of two suits numbered 38 and 39 of 1916 which were tried together before the Subordinate Judge of Palamau. In the former suit Hara Pershad Sahu and others, the representatives in-interest of Dhanukdari Sahu deceased, sued Prabhu Dayal Singh and his brother Amar Dayal Singh, members of a joint family governed by the Mitakshara Law, to recover the principal and interest due on a mortgage bond, executed by Prabhu Dayal Singh alone in favour of Dhanukdari on the 17th April 1909, corresponding to the 12th

Baisakh 1316 F. S. By the terms of the bond an 8 annas share out of 16-annas in Tola Semaria, Mauza Narainpur, belonging to the joint family was hypothecated to secure a loan of Rs. 3,000 advanced to Prabhu Dayal Singh. The amount claimed in the suit was Rs. 5,357-8-6 for principal and interest after giving credit for two sums amounting in all to Rs. 2,591 9-3 due from the plaintiffs in that suit to the defendants as Chaudharana or rent of Bazar Garhwa of which the plaintiffs were lessees and the defendants part proprietors.

In the second suit Amar Dayal Singh and his brother Prabhu Dayal Singh sued Har Pershad Sahu and Dost Muhammad Sheikh to recover a sum of Rs. 4,470-12-6, made up of Rs. 2,89-7-3 for Chaudharana of the said Bazar for the first nine months of 1914 and Rs. 1,577-5-3 interest thereon at 2 per cent. per month.

In the former suit Amar Dayal alone appeared and filed a written statemant. He raised several pleas in defence. His case, so far as it is material to this appeal, is that he was the elder brother and Karta of the family and that his brother Prabhu Dayal had no right to mortgage the family property or any portion of it without his consent, the bond not having been executed for any necessity of the joint family or to secure an antecedent debt. He further alleged that Prabhu Dayal was a minor when he executed the bond. He also contested the plaintiffs' right in a suit of this nature to treat their liability for Chaudharana as extinguished by setting off a proportionate amount of the defendants' liability under the bond and denied that any permission to do so had been given. The plaintiffs thereupon petitioned the Court to be allowed to amend their claim by adding thereto the sum of Rs. 1,295-8, Amar Dayal's proportionate share of the Rs. 2,591 credited for Chaudharana in the plaint.

The defence to the second action was that the principal sum of Rs. 2,893 claimed had been discharged by certain payments made to or on behalf of the plaintiffs, viz., Rs. 285 13 deposited at the Daltonganj Khas Mahal office for dasas or repairs and improvements due from the plaintiffs in that suit, Rs. 2,591 due from the plaintiffs for interest under the mortgage and alleged to have been paid to Dhanukdari, Rs. 6 paid in cash to the plaintiffs, and another item of one gold mohur, amounting in all to more than the principal sum claimed. They denied that any interest was due or payable.

The learned Subordinate Judge found that the loan was not made for joint family purposes and that Amar Dayal, who was the elder brother and Karta of the family, did not consent to the execution of the bond and was not bound by it. These findings have not been challenged in this appeal. He further found that, on the authority of Sudaburt Pershad Suhoo v. Foolbash Koer ( ), one member of a joint Mitakshara family could not validly mortgage his share of the joint family property. He considered, however, that the mortgagees in such a case had a lien or equitable charge on the 8-annas share mortgaged by Prabhu Dayal and were entitled to sell the said share in order to realise their dues. For this finding he relied on the authority of Mahabeer Persad v. Ramyad Singh (2) and Madho Parshad v. Mehrban Singh (3). In estimating the amount due, he accepted the plaintiffs' evidence that an agreement had been come to between the parties to set off the Chaudharana against the interest due under the mortgage, but, for some reason not very clear, allowed only Prabhu Dayal's share to be set-off against the mortgage-debt.

Of the Rs. 2,893-7 payable to Prabhu Dayal and his brother for Chaudharana, he found that Rs. 285 13 had already been paid for their account by the plaintiffs for dasan leaving a balance of Rs 2,607-10 due to the two brothers half of which, amounting to Rs. 1,303 13, was payable to Prabhu Dayal as his share and this he considered as discharged by giving credit for it in the mortgage suit. As, however, the plaintiffs in that suit had given credit for Rs. 1,511-9-3 in their plaint as originally filed, he found that they were entitled to, roughly, Rs. 200 more than the sum claimed and assessed the amount of the decree, for which the plaintiffs should have a charge on Parbhu Dayal's undivided share at Rs. 5,556.

In the second suit, on the same principle, he found that Rs. 1,303-13 was due to Amar Dayal as his share of the Chaudharana and awarded him that sum together with interest at 12 per cent. per annum, amounting in all to Rs. 1,675.

From this decision Amar Dayal and Prabhu Dayal Singh have entered appeals in each of the suits and contend, as to the first, that the learned Judge was wrong in holding that the mortgagees had an equitable lien or charge on the mortgagor's share in the joint property. They further contend that Prabhu Dayal was a minor at the date when the mortgage was executed. As to the second suit they contend that, the share of both the brothers in the Chaudharana should have been decreed, and that the plea of set-off should not have been upheld.

The main question which was argued before us was as to the legal effect of the mortgage of joint family property executed by one member of a joint family to secure an advance made for his own purposes and unconnected with the family needs.

The learned Judge did not find that any special circumstances existed, such as were relied on in the case of Mahabeer Persad v. Ramyad Singh (2), creating an equitable lien or charge on the mortgaged property, nor were the mortgagees in possession of the property as in that and other cases relied upon by the respondents.

It becomes necessary to consider the cases relied on, in the light of subsequent decisions, to see how far they afford any authority for the proposition put forward by the respondents that a mortgage made by one member of a joint Mitakshara family for his own purposes and without the consent of the other members, where no antecedent debt or family necessity exists, creates a charge or lien on the mortgagor's undivided interest or gives the mortgagee any right to compel a partition in order to enforce his security. Mahabeer Persad's case (2), was decided in the High Court at Calcutta in 1873 by Phear and Ainslie, JJ., the latter expressing a somewhat hesitating assent to the judgment of his colleague. In the same year, in the case of Jugdeep Narain Singh v. Deendyal Lal (4), the same learned Judges set aside a sale of joint family property held in execution of a decree for money based on a mortgage-bond and refused to give the mortgagee-purchaser a lien on the property. In that case the father of the plaintiff, with whom he was joint in estate, executed a mortgage of a share in the family property in favour of the defendant Deendyal, to secure re payment of a loan for which no family necessity was proved. The mortgagor having defaulted, was sued on the bond by the mortgagee, Deendayal, who obtained a money decree for the amount secured and, in execution, put to sale and purchased the mortgagor's interest in other family property of the plaintiff and his father not covered by the bond. The plaintiff sued to set aside the sale making his father and the mortgagee purchasers defendants The Court, in setting aside the sale, refused to give the mortgagee a charge or lien on the mortgagor's undivided share, on the ground that there were no special circumstances warranting the application of the principle applied in Mahabeer Persad's case (2). On appeal to the Privy Council, their Lordships distinguished the case of a voluntary alienation from an attachment and sale of the judgment-debtor's interest in execution of a decree and, although they upheld the right of the plaintiff to set aside the sale, declared that the execution-purchaser acquired the share and interest of the mortgagor in the property and was entitled to take such proceedings as he should be advised to have that share and interest ascertained by partition [See Deendyal Lal v. Jugdeep Narain Singh (5)]. It is important to notice that in that case their Lordships did not think it right to express any dissent from the ruling of the High Court in Sudaburt's case (1) as to voluntary alienations and added, "but, however nice the distinction between the rights of a purchaser under voluntry conveyance and those of a purchaser under an execution sale may be, it is clear that a distinction may, and in some cases does, exist between them. It is sufficient to instance the seizure and sale of a share in a trading partnership at the suit of a separate creditor of one of the partners. The partner could not himself have sold his share so as to introduce a stranger into the firm without the consent of his co-partners, but the purchaser at the execution sale acquires the interest sold, with the right to have the partnership accounts taken in order to ascertain and realise its value.

"It seems to their Lordships that the same principle may and ought to be applied to shares in a joint undivided Hindu estate". That decision does not establish the contention that a mortgagee, in circumstances such as the present, acquires any right equitable or otherwise against the undivided share of his mortgagor in cases where there has been no attachment and sale by legal processes.

In Suraj Bunsi Koer v. Sheo Persad Singh (6), decided by the Judicial Committee in 1879, their Lordships drew a distinction between the rights of co-parceners in a Hindu family consisting of a father and his sons and those of a like family consisting of undivided brothers, the sons being affected by the obligations of Hindu Law to pay their father's debts, an obligation which does not exist in the case of brothers. They further laid down the following propositions:—

"First: That, where joint ancestral property has passed out of a joint family, either under a conveyance executed by a father in consideration of an antecedent debt, or in order to raise money to pay off an antecedent debt, or under a sale in execution of a decree for the father's debt, his sons, by reason of their duty to pay their father's debts, cannot recover that property, unless they show that the debts were contracted for immoral purposes, and that the purchasers had notice that they were so contracted; and, secondly, that the purchasers at an execution sale, being strangers to the suit, if they have not notice that the debts were so contracted are not bound to make inquiry beyond what appears on the face of the proceedings."

That also was a case in which the property had been purchased at an execution-sale in pursuance of a decree obtained against the deceased father of the plaintiffs, the purchaser in that case being a stranger to the suit but having notice of the plaintiffs' objection to the sale. Their Lordships held that, the property having been attached for the debts of the co sharer during his lifetime, the sale was good for his share but as it appeared on the evidence that the debt was one for which, according to Hindu Law, the other co-sharers could not be made liable, the sale was not good for their shares.

In Madho Parshad v. Mehrban Singh (3), which came before the Judicial Committee in 1890, the authorities were again reviewed.

In that case Mehrban Singh and his uncle Zalim Singh were members of a joint family under the Mitakshara Law. Zalim, for his own benefit without the consent of his nephew who was a minor and without legal necessity, sold to the defendant Madho Parshad by three registered deeds his undivided share in three villages, the joint property of the family. Upon his uncle's death, which occurred shortly afterwards, the plaintiff, through his next friend, sued Madho Parshad for cancellation of the deeds and possession of the property by right of survivorship. The defendant contended that the sale, if set aside, should only be vacated on the terms that he should have a lien on the interest sold for the return of the purchase-money. Lord Watson, in delivering the judgment of the Board, said,—"anyone of several members of a joint family is entitled to require partition of ancestral property, and his demand to that effect, if it be not complied with, can be enforced by legal process. So long as his interest is indefinite, he is not in a position to dispose of it at his own hand, and for his own purposes, but, as soon as partition is made, he becomes the sole owner of his share, and has the same powers of disposal as if it had been his acquired property. Actual partition is not in all cases essential. An agreement by the members of an undivided family to hold the joint property individually in definite shares, or the attachment of a member's undivided share in execution of a decree at the instance of his creditor, will be regarded as sufficient to support the alienation of a member's interest in the estate or a sale under the execution,"—the judgment then deals with the earlier cases already referred to and points out that in Deendyal's case (5) their Lordships had distinguished the cases of a purchaser by private bargain and at an execution sale. On the principle laid down by Lord Watson the attachment and sale in execution, at the instance of the creditor was sufficient to support the alienation presumably on the ground that it was tantamount to a separation of the judgment-debtor's interest from that of the other co-parceners. The case of Suraj Bunsi Koer v. Sheo Pershad Singh (6) did not, in Lord Watson's opinion, carry the matter any further. Referring to Mahabeer Persad's case (2) he observes, "it is unnecessary to decide whether, if Zalim Singh had been still alive, and so entitled to resume his undivided share on cancellation of the sale-deeds, it would have been possible to order partition and to charge Zalim's divided share with the Rs. 10,000 paid to him by the appellant." The decision is clearly no authority for the proposition that a mortgage of an undivided share of the family property, executed by a member of a joint family without the consent of his co-parceners and not being to secure an antecedent debt or justified by the necessity of the family, confers on the mortgagee any right to proceed against the property even to the extent of the interest of the mortgagor.

This question arose and was decided against the mortgagee's contention in the case of Narain Prasad v. Sarnam Singh (7). In that case Surnam Singh and two other persons, the managing members of different joint families, hypothecated their respective rights and interests in certain villages without the consent of their co-parceners to Narain Prasad who sued on the mortgage-bond. The defendants were Surnam Singh, the sole survivor of the mortgagors, and the families of all three. Family necessity was not proved nor was there any antecedent debt. Their Lordships, affirming the decision of the Allahabad High Court, declared such a mortgage to be void and further decided that it gave the mortgagee no rights against the Karta's interests in the joint family property. It was argued that the mortgage was not void but only voidable, and that on the principle laid down in Mahabeer Persad's case (2) the mortgagor's interest should be declared available upon partition as security for the bond debt. In delivering the judgment of the Board, Lord Haldane, in referring to Mahabeer Persad's case(2), said,—"on looking at the facts, their Lordships agree with the observation of Mr. Parik that there was very little, if any, evidence of such a representation, but that there was such a representation was the basis of the judgment, and, unless the learned Judges had held that an equity arose out of it, their judgment would have amounted to this, that for every mortgage by the head of a joint family the property of the joint family could be made available to the extent of the interest of the mortgagor. Now, whatever may happen when there are special circumstances such as there were in the case referred to, that is not the general law. The general law is quite plainly laid down by Lord Watson in delivering the judgment of this Board in the case of Madho Parshad v. Mehrban Singh (3),"—His Lordship then quoted the passage from Lord Watson's judgment in that case already set out above and added,—"Now these are the principles which govern this and all other cases of the kind, and, according to these principles, there can be no doubt that the present mortgage is void. There were no such special circumstances, as the learned Judges seem to find, in the first case above quoted entitling them to impose terms upon the plaintiffs, and, whether Lord Watson approved that case or not, which is not quite clear, he at all events said that it had no application which would affect the operation of the principles which he laid down as above quoted."

That decision was given in 1917 and has been followed and referred to with approval in two more recent cases which came up for decision before their Lordships Board [See Anant Ram v. Collector of Etah (8) and Manna Lal v. Karu Singh (9) decided on the 29th July last year]. In the former case their Lordships refused to give effect to the mortgagee's contention that, although the mortgage-debt was not incurred for family necessity, the mortgagor's interest in the family property could be sold in enforcement of the mortgage. In the latter they were prepared to set aside a decree of the Calcutta High Court ordering the father's share of the family property to be sold on partition if the amount found due were not paid within a specified time. This, however, did not become necessary on the facts found by their Lordships. That was a case where a mortgage was executed by the manager of a joint family. The suit was brought on a bond against the mortgagor and his sons. It was found by the Calcutta High Court that the loan for which the property was hypothecated was not justified by family necessity and that Court dismissed the suit as against the two sons but ordered, as against the father, that if the amount due were not paid within a specified time his share of the mortgaged property should be liable to be sold on partition. Lord Phillimore, delivering the judgment of the Board in that case, said,—"Upon the finding of the High Court, this decree was too favourable to the plaintiff and incorrect. The law was finally established no doubt since that decision by this Board in the case of Narain Prasad v. Sarnam Singh (7), which determined that 'a mortgage of the joint family property of a Mitakshara family by its Karta (or manager) unless necessity or an antecedent debt is proved, is void; the transaction itself gives to the mortgagee no rights against the Karta's interest in the joint family property.'"

Two other cases, which may be shortly noticed, were called to our attention by the learned Counsel for the respondents in support of his contention that the mortgagees were entitled at least to a declaration that the property should be held in specified shares by the co paracener with a charge or lien upon Parbhu Dayal's shares for the mortgage debt. In the first case, Ram Sunder Das v. Barhamdeo Narayan Thakur (10), certain members of a joint family executed a mortgage of a share in family property in favour of the appellant. The mortgagors had apparently represented that the property was their separate property and that they had power to charge it. The mortgagees sued and obtained a decree and proceeded to bring the mortgaged properties to sale. One of the respondents who had a joint interest in the property thereupon brought a suit to have it declared that the property was joint and that the mortgage-deed was inoperative. The trial Court found that the property was joint and that the mortgage was not legal and that the specific shares covered by it could not be sold in execution of the decree but that the mortgagees were entitled to sell the right, title and interest of the mortgagors. The mortgagee appealed from this decision to the High Court and contended that the decree should have been for a declaration that the shares of the mortgagors should be specified and that it should be declared that he had a lien on them. The plaintiff, respondent in the appeal, did not contend that the mortgage gave no rights whatever against the mortgagor's share but supported the view of the lower Court that the mortgagor's interests could be sold in execution of the mortgage-decree. The High Court accepted the appellants' contention and, on the ground that the mortgagors had represented that they had power to charge the property, held that they were bound to make good that representation by the exercise of such proprietary right over the property as they possessed, viz, by partition, and ordered that the property should be held by the co-parceners in certain proportions and that the shares of the mortgagors should be held by them subject to the mortgagee's lien for the amount of the mortgage debt. The only question for determination in that case was the form of the decree. The right of the mortgagee to relief in one form or another was assumed without argument. The assumption upon which the judgment is based may possibly be justified on the ground that there was a special representation by the mortgagors. But, in view of the decision in Narain Prasad v. Sarnam Singh (7), it can no longer be regarded as an authority for the proposition put forward on behalf of the respondents in the present case. In the second case, Ram Sundar Das v. Nathuni Singh (11), the respondent, a co-parcener in a Mitakshara family, executed a mortgage in favour of the appellant. The latter obtained a decree and proceeded to put it in execution. Another member of the family, who was no party to the mortgage, then brought a suit for a declaration that the properties covered by the mortgage belonged to a joint Mitakshara family of which he and the mortgagors were members and that, consequently, the mortgagors had no authority to execute the mortgage in respect to any definite share of the property, and prayed that the mortgage and the decree passed thereon should be declared void and inoperative. The Court declared the mortgage void as against the share of the mortgagors but further ordered that the properties were to be held by the mortgagors and their co-sharer, the plaintiff, in certain specified shares and that the shares of the mortgagors were to be held subject to the lien of the mortgagee for the sum advanced and interest. The mortgagee then prayed for sale of the specific shares of the mortgagors in execution of the decree originally obtained by him. Objection was taken that the decree was incapable of execution on the ground that it had been invalidated by the subsequent decree of the High Court and that the only remedy of the decree-holder was to institute a fresh suit to enforce the lien declared by the decree of the High Court. The Subordinate Judge upheld the objection and the mortgagee-decree-holder appealed. It was held by the High Court that the mortgagee could bring the shares to sale in execution of his decree and that it was not incumbent upon him to institute a separate suit to enforce the lien. It does not appear from the judgment that any objection was taken to the mortgagee's right to a declaration for a lien and the only question for decision was whether that lien could be enforced by sale of the mortgagors' share in the execution proceedings then pending or whether it was necessary for him to bring a fresh suit. Although in this case also it was assumed that the mortgagee was entitled to a lien on the mortgagors' share the question was not directly in conflict. If and in so far as it is at variance with the decision in Narain Prasad v. Sarnam Singh (7)it cannot be regarded as an authority for the respondents' contention.

The result of the authorities appears to me to be that a mortgage of the whole or a share of the joint family property of a Mitakshara family, unless justified by legal necessity or by an antecedent debt or assented to by the other members of the family, is void and inoperative as against the property hypothecated and gives the mortgagee no rights even against the mortgagors' undivided share. Where, however, the mortgagors' interest has been separated from that of the other members of the family, actual partition by metes and bounds not being essential for this purpose, or where the share has by legal process been attached or sold at the instance of the creditor, it may become available as security for the mortgage debt. In special circumstances, where the property has already passed into the hands of the mortgagee, the Court, if satisfied that the equities of the case require it, may in its discretion set aside the alienation upon the terms that the property when restored shall be held in separate shares, the share of the mortgagor being subject to a lien for the mortgage-debt and interest.

In the facts of the present case, the principle laid down in Narain Prasad v. Sarnam Singh (7) appears to be applicable. The suit is one to enforce a mortgage against the joint family property the mortgagors being in possession. No equities can arise as in a case where the property has been sold in execution of the decree or has otherwise passed into the hands of the mortgagees.

It was contended, however, that an intention on the part of the mortgagor to separate from the rest of the family should be inferred from the terms of the mortgage-bond itself, which purports to hypothecate only the mortgagor's interest, that is an 8-annas share out of the whole property. I am unable to accept this view. In more than one of the cases already mentioned the mortgagor purported to charge his own share and interest only and nowhere was it held that this was any evidence of partition and the evidence of the plaintiffs themselves in the present case shows that the two brothers were living in commensality and joint in estate at the date when the suit was instituted.

One other point which, in view of the conclusion already arrived at, it is perhaps not necessary to determine but which was argued before us may be mentioned. The appellants contended that at the date when the bond was executed Prabhu Dayal Singh was a minor. The evidence given on behalf of the respondents showed that he was about 30 years of age in April 1917, He would, therefore, be about 22 in April 1909 when the bond was executed. According to Amar Dayal's evidence, his brother was 25 or 26 in April 1917 when his evidence was given, which would make him just over or just under 18 years at the date of the mortgage. His evidence on this point in cross examination was certainly very unsatisfactory and on some of his answers his brother would appear to have been well over 18 years of age at the date when the mortgage was executed. The learned Judge was dissatisfied with his evidence and refused to accept it and found that there was no satisfactory evidence that Prabhu Dayal, was a minor when he executed the bond. A horoscope, however, of Parbhu Dayal purporting to be made by one Ram Nandan Ram, who was dead, was tendered in evidence and proved by his son to be in his father's handwriting. If this can be accepted as conclusive, Parbhu Dayal was born in Sraban 1948 Sambat, and would, therefore, be just under 18 years of age when the bond was executed The learned Subordinate Judge rejected the horoscope as not being admissible in evidence to prove the date of Prabhu Dayal's birth. Section 32 of the Evidence Act was relied on for the contention that the horoscope was admissible. Under that section written statements made by dead persons are admissible in certain cases, one of the cases being "when the statement relates to the existence of any relationship by blood, marriage or adoption between persons as to whose relationship by blood, marriage or adoption the person making the statement has special means of knowledge and when the statement was made before the question in dispute was raised". Such statements are also admissible when they relate to the existence of any like relationship and are contained in any Will or deed relating to the affairs of the family to which the deceased person belonged or in any family pedigree or upon any tomb-stone, family portrait or any thing on which such statements are usually made. The question to be decided in the present case would hardly appear to be one of relationship by blood, marriage or adoption. There is no dispute as to the relationship between any of the parties and, but for the illustration (1) appended to the section, I should have taken the view that the horoscope is not admissible for the purpose for which it was tendered. I am constrained to hold that the document is admissible, however, by reason of the illustration. The question was also considered by Coxe and Beachcroft, JJ., in Monindra Mohan Roy v. Ram Krishna (12), where earlier authorities were reviewed and it was decided that statements as to age made by deceased persons in the circumstances contemplated in the section were admissible. The horoscope, however, is merely evidence and is not conclusive and in face of the other conflicting evidence in the case I should have been inclined to remand the case for further consideration on this point had such a course been necessary.

It follows, however, from the conclusion arrived at on the other point in the case that the plaintiffs are not entitled to any charge or lien upon the mortgaged property. It was not contended that they were entitled to a personal decree against the defendant No. 1, Prabhu Dayal, the suit having been brought more than 6 years after the due date of the mortgage. In the result, I would set aside the decree of the Subordinate Judge and dismiss Suit No. 38 of 1916 with costs against the respondents here and in the Court below.

With regard to the appeal in Suit No. 39 of 1916; it appears that a sum of Rs. 2,893-7-3 was due from the defendants in that suit for Chaudharana for the year 1914. At that time Prabhu Dayal was under a personal obligation to pay interest by the terms of the bond which then amounted to over Rs. 3,000. The evidence of Hara Pershad, the first defendant in the suit, is to the effect that the two brothers directed him to retain Rs. 2,591 and some odd annas of the Chaudharana against the mortgage-money and that, under their orders, this amount, actually Rs. 2,591 9-3 as appears from the plaint in the mortgage suit, was set off against the mortgage-money, and that a further sum of Rs. 16 was paid. It was further not disputed that Rs. 285-13 0 were paid for dasan for the lessors' account and could properly be deducted from the rent. These sums together amount to the sum claimed for Chaudharana. If this evidence is believed, the whole Chaudharana was settled in account between the parties and nothing remains due. There was no reason why Amar Dayal, who was the Karta of the family, as well as his brother should not agree to discharge the debt of one of them in this manner out of their joint family funds. Prabhu Dayal did not give evidence. His brother Amar Dayal, it is true, denied that he authorised Hara Pershad to set off the Chaudharana against the mortgage-money. The learned Judge said he believed Hara Pershad but he only allowed him to set-off Prabhu Dayal's share of the Chaudharana against the mortgage-debt, and entered judgment for the remaining half. Why he gave effect to the agreement to the extent of the half share of Prabhu Dayal only is not very clear. On his finding, it would seem that he ought to have dismissed the suit. There is, however, no appeal from the decree by the defendants.

I can see no reason for disbelieving the story of Harprasad. It is also significant in this connection that no attempt was made to exact payment of the Chaudharana for the year 1914 until the 14th September 1916 when the plaint was filed, that is 2 days after the mortgage suit was instituted. Accepting, as I do, the story of Hara Pershad, I can see no reason why the plaintiffs should not be bound by the agreement come to that the liability for the Chaudharana should be discharged by setting it off against the interest due at that time under the mortgage. I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

MULLICK, J.—I agree.

MADRAS HIGH COURT.

CIVIL APPEAL No. 326 OF 1918.

Present:—Sir John Wallis, KT., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Sadasiva Aiyar.

K. A. C. C. T. CHIDAMBARAM CHETTY AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS Nos. 2 TO 5—APPELLANTS

V. R. K. R. KARUTHAN CHETTY AND ANOTHER—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 26[2]—Partnership—Sub-partner, position and rights of—Agreement or settlement between partners after winding-up, whether binding on sub-partners—Finding that party is sub-partner—Appeal—Parties not objecting to finding—Appellate Court deciding that sub-partner is not necessary party—Res judicata—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 11.

Per Wallis, C. J.—Section 263 of the Indian Contract Act deals with the continuing authority of the former partners to bind one another after dissolution and has no application to a settlement between the partners after dissolution which is binding on them by virtue of their agreement and not by virtue of this section and whether or not it is binding on the sub-partner of one of them. A sub-partner should ordinarily accept the accounts of profits agreed upon between the partners, but he is entitled to accounts after winding-up and arrangements between the principal partners after dissolution cannot be enforced against the sub-partner Section 32 of the English Partnership Act should be applied in determining the rights and obligations of sub-partners in India [p 81, cols. 1 & 2.]

Per Sadasiva Aiyar, J—The law in India is the same as in England, that sub-partners must ordinarily accept the accounts taken between the partners, but have not the right and are not subject to any duty to take part in the proceedings in which the accounts are taken The assignee of a share whether completed or only by way of mortgage from one of two partners cannot claim to interfere with the business so long as it is a going concern. The assignor stands in the position of agent or trustee for the assignee and any settlement of accounts made by him prior to dissolution and up to the date of dissolution is binding in the same manner on the assignee as on the assignor But, just as and to the extent that the assignor can surcharge and falsify on the ground of mistake or fraud in the settlement, the assignee may also do so After dissolution also a fair settlement by the partners would be binding on their assignees, but not so a fraudulent or collusive settlement. [p. 81, cols. 1 & 2.]

Where a Court has recorded a finding that a certain party defendant before it is a sub-partner and the Appellate Court, before which no objection is taken to the finding, dismisses the suit on the ground that, assuming him to be a sub-partner, he is not a necessary party, the finding is not res judicata in a subsequent suit. JUDGMENT.

WALLIS, C. J.—I agree with the order proposed by my learned brother, whose judgment I have had the advantage of reading. I agree with him that there is no res judicata in this case on any view, and it is, therefore, unnecessary for me to consider whether the doctrine of res judicata has any application to the case seeing that the former suit was dismissed as against the sub-partners on the ground that, assuming them to be such, they were not proper parties to that suit; as regards the question whether the settlement, Exhibit 3, made between the plaintiff and his partner C. V. C. T. of the dissolution of the partnership is binding on the present defendants as his sub-partners, assuming them to be such, I am of opinion that it is not. Section 263 of the Contract Act, the language of which clearly resembles that of section 38 of the Partnership Act, 1890, no doubt provides that the rights and obligations of the partners continue in all things necessary for the winding up of the partnership. That section deals, in my opinion, with the continuing authority of the former partnership to bind one another after dissolution and has no application to a settlement between the partners after dissolution which is binding on them by virtue of their agreement and not by virtue of this section, and whether or not it is binding on the sub partner of one of them. The question whether such a settlement is binding on the sub-partner against the principal partner gives rise to different considerations. The Indian Contract Act, 1872, does not deal specifically with the case of sub-partners except in so far as by section 263 it prohibits the introduction of a new partner into a firm without the consent of all the partners and, in my opinion, it is dealt with by section 31 of the English Partnership Act, 1890. I can see no reason why the rules laid down by the Legislature in that Act, which was drafted with great care and with the assistance of eminent lawyers, should not be applied in this country where our Contract Act is silent, especially when they appear to merely give effect to the earlier decisions. I can find nothing in the Contract Act to warrant us in adopting a different rule. Under section 31 an assignee from a partner, which term includes a sub-partner, cannot interfere in any way in the management of the business and must accept the account of profits agreed to by partners. Otherwise, a new partner would, in effect, be introduced into the business by one partner without the consent of the other partners and the continuance of the partnership would be endangered. If any one chooses to take an assignment of a share in a partnership, he must accept it subject to the restrictions which are necessary for the carrying on of the partnership business, one of which is that he must accept the accounts of profits agreed upon between the partners. The same considerations do not apply after the dissolution of the partnership and there are not the same difficulties in the way of allowing the sub-partner to enforce his full rights against the assigning partner, and, accordingly, section 31 entitles him, for the purpose of ascertaining his share, to an account as from the date of dissolution. As held by Vaughan Williams, L. J; in Watts v. Driscoll (1), an assignee would be entitled to such an account independently of section 31 which only affirm his right to it. As pointed out by Rigby, L. J., in the same case, there would be no equity in enforcing on the assignee of one partner a bargain entered into between the partners after dissolution which might involve gross injustice to the assignee and might have been entered into for that very purpose. My experience of partnership suits leads me to the opinion that the rule is at least as necessary in this country as in England and that the opposite rule would operate as a strong inducement to commit fraud, and would frequently result in very questionable settlements, such as that in the present case, being entered into between the partners to the prejudice of the sub-partners. I am, therefore, of opinion that the sub partner is entitled to an account under the rule embodied in section 31 as interpreted in Whetham v. Davey (2), Watts v. Driscoll (1) and Bonnin v. Neame (3). What I mean is that, in the absence of any settlement between the partners before dissolution, which of course would be binding on the sub-partner, the sub-partner after the dissolution is entitled to have an account taken to ascertain the share of the partners under whom he claims, as in Whetham v. Davey (2), as, without such an account, it would be impossible to say what he was entitled to.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—The defendants Nos. 2 to 5 are the appellants. The 4th defendant is the son, and the 5th defendant is the grandson, of the 1st defendant who died after suit. Of the five plaintiffs, the plaintiffs Nos. 2 to 5 are the undivided sons of the 1st plaintiff. I shall speak shortly of the 1st plaintiff as the plaintiff hereinafter.

The suit was brought for the recovery of the contribution from the defendants in the following circumstances:—

(1) The plaintiff and one C. V. C. T. Chidambaram Chetty (hereinafter called C. V. C. T.) carried on money-lending business as partners, the business being conducted at Paungde, in Lower Burma, the plaintiff's share being 10/16 and C. V. C. T's share being 6/16.

(2) Out of the plaintiff's 10 shares he assigned three shares, one to each of the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 as his sub partners for consideration. (The defendants Nos. 1 and 2 denied that they were sub-partners but the 3rd defendant admitted that he purchased one share from 1st defendant.)

(3) The business in Lower Burma ended in a loss and the plaintiffs instituted Original Suit No. 293 of 19 2 against C. V. C. T. (and his sons) and also against the present defendants Nos. 1 to 3 (defendants Nos. 8 to 10 in that suit) for dissolving the firm and for obtaining the usual appurtenant reliefs. The Ramnad Sub-Court passed a preliminary decree dissolving the firm from 20th February 1914 (the date of that decree) and directing the taking of accounts after it gave the finding that the present defendants Nos. 1 to 3 were the plaintiff's sub-partners each for one share as alleged by the plaintiff.

(4) On 4th July 1914 the plaintiff and C. V. C. T. agreed upon a statement of accounts filed in the Ramnad Sub-Court according to which statement nearly Rs. 2,54,000 was agreed to be the total loss incurred by the firm. That Court in its final decree, passed on 15th July 1914, held each of the present defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 liable to pay Rs. 15 872-8-0 to the plaintiff (their principal partner) for their respective 1/16th shares. The total sum payable by all the three was thus 47 thousand and odd rupees.

(5) Meanwhile, the present defendants Nos. 1 to 3 (then defendants Nos. 8 to 10) had filed Appeal Suit No. 97 of 1914 against the preliminary decree of the Sub-Court of Ramnad and they afterwards filed three separate appeals against the final decree. The principal grounds in these appeals were,—

(a) There is no evidence that the 8th and 9th defendants (the present Nos. 1 and 2 defendants) are sub-partners. (b) The lower Court ought to have dismissed the suit against the defendants Nos. 8, 9 and 10 if they were only sub partners and as soon it was found that the plaintiff's case that they were principal partners was not made out. (These two grounds are the principal grounds of attack against the preliminary decree). (c) The statement of accounts, Exhibit III, filed by the plaintiff and C. V. C. T. is no evidence against the defendants Nos. 8 to 10. The plaintiff and C. V C. T. acted collusively and fraudulently in accepting each other's statements on 15th July 1914 and the defendants Nos. 8 to 10 had no knowledge or opportunity to object to Exhibit III. (This was the principal ground of attack against the final decree.)

(6) The High Court allowed the appeals of the present defendants Nos. 1 to 3 by the judgment in Execution Appeal No. 4, dated 14th April 1916 (Oldfield and Sadasiva Aiyar, JJ.) I shall extract the material passages in the judgment pronounced by Oldfield, J., and concurred in by the other learned Judge.

"The preliminary decree passed decided that they (the defendants Nos. 8 to 10) were sub-partners and so far no objection has been taken * * . The argument for the 8th to 10th defendants is, shortly, that having no rights or liabilities in connection with the firm or any of its members except the 1st plaintiff, they have no concern with the taking of the accounts between its members and cannot be bound by it and they should, therefore, have been dismissed from the suit as soon as the decision against their position as partners was reached. * * It is urged (contra) that the 8th to 10th defendants were either necessary or proper parties because, multiplication of proceedings would be avoided if the plaintiff's rights or liabilities in the partnership were determined once for all in a manner which would be binding on the 8th to 10th defendants as well as C. V. C. T. since, whether or no the 8th to 10th defendants were directly liable for any proportion of the partnership liabilities. Such determination would be necessary in the adjustment between them and the 1st plaintiff. This is not, in my opinion, sustainable. There is nothing regarding the relations between the sub-partners and partners in the Indian Contract Act. Section 31, however, of the English Partnership Act provides that the assignee of a share in a partnership is entitled "only to receive the share of the profits to which the assigning partner would otherwise be entitled and the assignee must accept the account of profits agreed to by the partners." The assignee is "in case of a dissolution of the partnership entitled to receive the share of the partnership assets to which the assigning partner is entitled as between himself and the other partners and for the purpose of ascertaining that share to an account as from the date of the dissolution." And this may be taken as the law in India since it is well supported by authority.* * * * "The result is that sub-partners must ordinarily accept the account taken between the partners, but have not the right and are not subject to any duty to take part in the proceedings in which it is taken."

For these reasons the learned Judge decided that the defendants Nos. 8 to 10 were neither necessary nor proper parties to Original Suit No. 293 of 1912, allowed the appeals and dismissed the plaintiff's suit so far as the defendants Nos. 8 to 10 were concerned. The result was that the direction in the final decree that each of these three defendants should pay Rs. 15,800 and odd to the plaintiff was also set aside. The judgment was, as I said before, pronounced on 14th April 1916. The present suit was brought on 21st July 1916 for recovery of the total of the three items of Rs. 15,800 and odd or Rs. 47,617 6 9 with compound interest with six months' rests from 20th February 1914, jointly and severally from the defendants.

The principal issues framed in this suit are the issues Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5, 7 and 8 which are as follows:—

(1) Whether defendants Nos. 1 and 2 were sub-partners of 1st plaintiff in the V. R. K R. firm mentioned in the plaint?

(2) Whether defendants Nos. 1 and 2 are precluded from raising the plea that they are sub-partners by reason of the decision in Original Suit No. 293 of 1912 on the file of the Ramnad Sub-Court and Appeal Suit No. 197 of 1914 on the file of the High Court of Madras?

(4) Whether the statement of accounts showing the losses is fraudulent and collusive?

(5) What are the accounts to be taken and, from what date are they to be taken?

(7) Whether plaintiffs are entitled to a joint decree against all the defendants?

(8) Whether plaintiffs are entitled to any, and, if so, what interest?

The compound interest claimed with six months' rests was disallowed by the lower Court on the 8th issue and simple interest at 6 per cent. was allowed from the date of the preliminary decree, that is, 20th February 1914, in the former suit of 1912. On the 1st and 2nd issues the lower Court held that the question whether the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 were sub-partners of the plaintiff was res judicata against the contention that they were not such sub-partners by the decision in the former suit though that suit was dismissed by the High Court as against them. The 3rd defendant had admitted even in the former suit that he was sub-partner for 1/16th share. On the 3rd, 4th and 5th issues the lower Court held that the common statement, Exhibit III, filed in the former suit by the plaintiff and C.V.C.T was not shown to be fraudulent or collusive, that that statement was binding upon the defendants Nos. 1 to 3 and that the defendants are, therefore, liable to contribute towards the losses of the firm as found in the final decree in that suit and also to contribute towards the subsequent payments found to have been made by the plaintiffs to partnership creditors. On the 7th issue, the Sub-Judge held that the plaintiff was entitled only to a separate decree against each of the defendants Nos. 1 to 3 for Rs 15,000 and odd, and interest and not a joint decree for Rs. 47,000 and interest as claimed in the plaint.

The questions we have to consider in this appeal are (1) whether the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 were sub-partners of the plaintiff and whether the lower Court was right in holding that the question was res judicata by the decision in the previous suit of 1912; (2) whether the defendants are bound by the statement of accounts, Exhibit III, agreed upon between the principal partners, the plaintiff and C. V. C. T., and filed by them on the 14th July 1914, or are they entitled to have the accounts of the partnership re-taken as regards the assets and liabilities as they stood on the date of dissolution, namely, 20th February 1914.

As regards the first point, it seems to me difficult to hold that the judgment (Exhibit A4) of this Court in the appeal in the former suit intended to decide finally that the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 were sub-partners of plaintiff. It only recited that no objection was taken before the learned Judges to the decision of the lower Court that they were sub-partners and then it proceeded to decide the appeal on the footing that they were sub partners and then held finally that they were neither necessary nor proper parties on that footing. I am myself inclined to take a very liberal view so as to extend the bar of res judicata as far as possible. [See Rama Krishna Naidu v. Krishnaswami Naidu (4).] But I do not think that the intention of the parties, or of this Court, to obtain or give a final decision on that question when it was before the High Court on appeal in the former suit is so clearly made out as to enable me to hold that, notwithstanding that it was unnecessary to decide that question for the disposal of the appeal, this Court did so decide it in a final manner and that decision is, therefore, res judicata. The case has, therefore, to go back for a fresh decision on the merits after taking evidence on this question.

The remaining point for decision is, whether the statement, Exhibit III, filed by the plaintiff and C. V. C. T. in the former suit, is binding on the defendants. On this question, learned arguments, citing English decisions mainly based on clause (2) of section 31 of the English Partnership Act, were addressed to us and I think that the law governing partnership transactions is laid down with sufficient clearness in the Indian Contract Act itself. The assignee of a share (whether completed or only by way of mortgage) from one of two partners not having any privity of contract with the other partner, can, of course, not claim to interfere with the business so long as it is a going concern. The assignor stands in the position of a trustee or agent for the assignee and any settlement of accounts made by him prior to dissolution, and up to the date of dissolution, is binding in the same manner on the assignee as on the assignor. But just as and to the extent that the assignor can surcharge and falsify on the ground of mistake or fraud in the settlement, the assignee may also do so. After dissolution, according to section 263 of the Contract Act, the rights and obligations of the partners continue in all things necessary for the winding-up of the business of the partnership. If, for the purpose of such winding-up, the assignor settles accounts with his partner in a proper manner, it seems to me, on principle, that such settlement should be binding on the assignee, just as and to the extent that it is binding on the assignor subject, of course, to the right to surcharge and falsify for proper causes shown. Any fraudulent or collusive settlement of accounts made by the assignor is, of course, not binding on the assignee. If there are English decisions which imply that a settlement made by the assignor after dissolution of partnership for the purpose of winding it up is in no way binding on the assignee, I do not feel myself bound by those decisions and I respectfully differ from them. The observation in the case in Williams v. Fole (5) rather seems to show that even in England, the English Court has the power to bind the assignee by such a settlement of account made by the assignor in certain circumstances. I do not think there is anything even in section 31 of the English Partnership Act which gives the assignee an unconditional right to have the accounts completely re taken in those circumstances, and the observations tending to an opposite conclusion (if they really tend to such a conclusion, a matter about which I feel some doubt) are based, in my opinion, on a rather narrow view of the meaning of the 2nd clause of section 31 of the Partnership Act and seem to have ignored the provisions of section 33 of the English Partnership Act corresponding to section 263 of the Indian Contract Act. However, I express my opinion on the English Act with very great diffidence as my knowledge of the history of bankruptcy legislation in England is almost negligible. If, as I hold, the assignor is a trustee or agent of the assignee, I do not see why the assignor's partner should not settle accounts bona fide with the assignor and why his right to so settle should be restricted by an assignment made without his consent.

(4) 52 Ind. Cas. [illegible] 36 M. L. J. 641; (1919) M. W. N. 7; 25 M. L. T. 88; 9 L. W. 180.

The question, therefore, is whether the joint statement of account, Exhibit III, filed on 14th July 1914 by the plaintiff and C. V. C. T., is a bona fide settlement or whether it is fraudulent and collusive.

On this question I feel constrained to differ from the finding of the lower Court. The accounts of the partnership were kept by the salaried agent Olagappa Chetty at Paungde in Lower Burma and were in his possession till 23rd March 1909. On that date Olagappa Chetty and plaintiff went before mediators at that place and signed the agreement, Exhibit IV, in their presence. That document provides that the plaintiff should make himself liable to and pay Rs. 8,000 due to certain persons (from whom Olagappa had borrowed money on his own personal credit on hand loans) within 12th April 1909, that Olagappa should in his turn write up the accounts properly and prepare the Ayinthokai account before the same date (12th April 1909) and that, if the plaintiff pays up Rs. 8,000 to the creditors before 12th April, the promissory notes, documents, jewels, decrees and documents should be put into plaintiff's possession by Olagappa. It is the case of the plaintiff that he did pay the sum of Rs. 8,000 according to the said agreement (see also plaintiff's statement of account, Exhibit II). It is difficult to believe that he so gave Rs. 8,000 out of his own pocket without getting back the account books and Ayinthokai statement from Olagappa. Olagappa died in 1911, that is, two years after the date of Exhibit IV. The plaintiff never made any demand on Olagappa for delivery of the Ayinthokai accounts before Olagappa's death. The plaintiff's story that he did not get back the accounts is, therefore, not believed by me. In a document, Exhibit V, dated 13th April 1909, signed by the plaintiff, he says "As I have received from you all the accounts and on demand deeds of the firm at Paungde in which you had been conducting agency business on our behalf under the Vilasam of V. K. (which is the plaintiff's own Vilasam) no connection exists between us and yourself in respect of the said firm. Should the other partners make demands on you, I shall not only be answerable for the same but also pay any costs which you may incur thereby * * * As I have received from you free of all encumbrances all the accounts and on-demand deeds by returning to you the salary obit which you had given there shall be no connection between you and ourselves in future." The plaintiff's case is that he signed the document, Exhibit B, without receiving the accounts. None of the arbitrators who settled the accounts between the plaintiff and Olagappa Chetty have been called on the plaintiff's side to prove that, notwithstanding the acknowledgment made by him in Exhibit V, he did not receive the accounts from Olagappa. Reliance is placed on the plaintiff's side on a telegram, Exhibit K, sent to the plaintiff by C. V. C. T. (the other partner) on the 23rd August 1909. It is an obscure telegram which is as follows:—

"Is Olagappa bringing account books with him or has not by post reply without delay immediately."

As far as I could see, the meaning seems to be "Is Olagappa bringing account-books or is he not?" It is argued for the plaintiff that if the plaintiff had received the account-books from Olagappa in April 1909, according to Exhibits IV and V, at Paungde, C. V. C. T. would not have sent the telegram from Karaikudi, Madura, to the plaintiff (who was then in a place in Burma) about the accounts as if Olagappa had the books with him. On the other hand, it seems to me that this telegram shows that C. V. C. T. knew that the plaintiff had control over the account books. It is probable that C. V. C. T. asked the plaintiff by a letter to send the account-books through Olagappa who was then going over to British India shortly and that, therefore, C. V. C. T. sent the telegram addressed to the plaintiff to send the accounts through Olagappa. The plaintiff has very cleverly suppressed the letters which passed between him and C.V.C.T. or between him and Olagappan in connection with all these matters, and contends that the accounts must be either with C.V.C T. or must have been with the deceased Olagappa, and if they had remained with the latter till his death it is not known what Olagappa had done with them or where the accounts now are. In the Suit No. 293 of 1912, C.V.C.T. and the plaintiff accused each other of suppressing the accounts; the plaintiff stating that Olagappa Chetty had fraudulently delivered the accounts to C. V. C. T., while C. V. C. T. stated that the plaintiff had received all the accounts from Olagappa, the plaintiff having gone over to Paungde specially in order to remove Olagappa from his position as agent and to conduct the business himself.

Though the plaintiff and C.V.C.T. accused each other of suppressing the accounts, neither of them produced the accounts before the Court and quietly, behind the back of the present defendants, (alleged sub partners), and while the defendants were absent in Madras for filing their appeal against the preliminary decree, made up their differences and filed the common statement, Exhibit III, on 14th July 1914. The plaintiff and C.V.C.T. in March 1914 (see Exhibits II and II-2) had filed their respective separate statements, but as the plaintiff was charging C.V.C.T. with having received Rs. 40,000 worth of cash, jewels and documents from Olagappa and C.V.C.T. was denying it, and as C.V.C.T. was, on his side, charging the plaintiff with suppression of accounts, and with making unfounded claims, the matter had been adjourned by the Court to 15th July 1914 for further hearing in order to appoint a Commissioner to go through the accounts and to prepare the necessary statements, in view to a final decree. The enquiry before a Commissioner was, however, burked by C.V.C.T. and the plaintiff and they admitted the correctness of the figures in their respective account statements, Exhibit II and II-A, except in the matter of the rate of interest claimed and the plaintiff gave up his contention that C.V.C.T. had obtained from Olagappa cash, jewels and documents (including, of course, the account books) worth Rs. 40,000. It is clear to my mind that the account books must have been either with C.V.C.T or with the plaintiff on the 14th July 1914, and that they must have, when they settled the matter on 14th July 1914, been in common control and possession of those accounts. Having regard, again, to the plaintiff's admission in Exhibit ·, I have very little doubt that the accounts have been with the plaintiff from April 1909. It is said that Exhibit V was prepared in March on the date of Exhibit IV itself but was postdated as 13th April. Reliance is placed on the recital in Exhibit IV that the salary chit of Olagappa should be returned to Olagappa on his giving up the accounts, whereas the salary chit, Exhibit S, was not so given I am not prepared to believe the plaintiff's statement about the antedating of Exhibit V or that the agreement written on a five-rupee stamp-paper mentioned in Exhibit IV is the ten-rupee stamped agreement, Exhibit V. The salary chit, Exhibit S may have been obtained from Olagappa before his death or from Olagappa's heirs afterwards and not necessarily from the arbitrators none of whom has been examined.

The plaintiff, as I said before, stood in the position of a trustee and agent to the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 (assuming of course for argument sake that the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 also were like the third defendant his sub partners and not mere strangers) The duty of showing, especially after quarrels had arisen between him and the defendants Nos. 1 to 3 at the very commencement of the suit of 1912, that a settlement made by him on their behalf also in July 1914 was a proper and bona fide settlement, lies, in my opinion, heavily on him. He is bound, as between himself and defendants Nos. 1 to 3, to keep and submit "clear and accurate accounts" and to furnish them with full and accurate information. Not only has he not proved that it was such a bona fide settlement, but his suppression of the partnership accounts which are in his possession and the suspicious haste with which he and C. V. C. T. agreed with each other to admit each other's statements [the plaintiff even withdrawing the appeal No. 199 of 1912, which he had himself filed against C. V. C T. and his sons impugning C. V. C. T's claims (see Exhibit IX (a)] clearly indicate, in my opinion, that C.V.C.T. and the plaintiff colluded against the present defendants (then defendants Nos. 8 to 10) and that Exhibit III does not represent a bona fide settlement of accounts between the principal partners.

GANGA MAL v. RAM SARUP.

It is argued for the plaintiff that, as Exhibit III made the plaintiff and the defendants liable to pay Rs. 2 ,890-10-10 to C V. C. T. the statement of account was prima facie bona fide as the plaintiff had no motive to put himself under liability to C. V. C. T. to pay him Rs. 29,890-10-10 besides Rs. 7,308 5 8 mentioned in Exhibit III as due to other creditors, total nearly Rs. 37,200. But Exhibit III shows that, if that account be accepted as correct, the plaintiff could recover Rs. 47,600 and odd from the defendants, thus making a profit of Rs. 11,400. The plaintiff and C. V. C. T. had only to collusively agree to admit each other's claims against the partnership, provided those claims are both in excess of the amounts really due to them in proportion to their respective shares Nos. 6 and 10, and the sum due to C.V. C.T. will still be Rs. 29,890-10-10 assuming that this was really due to C. V. C. T. from the partnership and was really paid by the plaintiff to him. To illustrate this, I shall put the following case. Instead of the amount due to the plaintiff being Rs. 1,21,525 and the amount due to C. V. C. T. being Rs. 1,25,125, as stated in Exhibit B, if the amount due to the plaintiff had been Rs. 50,000 only and the amount due to C. V. C. T. had been Rs. 82,225 it will be found that even then the same sum of Rs. 29,820 will be due to C. V. C. T. Thus the plaintiff had only to admit Rs. 42,900 more as due to C. V. C. T. than was really claimable by the latter and C. V. C. T. had to admit Rs. 71,525, more than was really claimable by the plaintiff as due to the plaintiff and C. V. C. T. would still get his Rs. 29,000 (which I shall assume to be due to him) while the present defendants could be made liable for Rs. 47,000 and odd though their actual liability will be far less if the true amounts due to the plaintiff and C. V. C. T. were only Rs. 82,225 and Rs. 50,000 respectively.

In the result, the lower Court's decision based upon the preliminary findings as to res judicata and as to the bona fide character of the settlement under Exhibit III will be set aside and the case will be remanded to the Subordinate Judge for fresh decision on the merits after directing the plaintiffs to produce the accounts in their possession. Costs hitherto will abide the result. The Court-fees on the appeal memo. will be refunded to the appellants.

A relation seven or eight degrees removed is not a near relation, and does not come within the definition of karabatdar karibi Where, therefore, a custom exists whereby a karabatdar karibi has a right to pre-empt, a relation 7 or 8 degrees removed is not entitled to that right. Second appeal against the decision of the District Judge, Azamgarh, dated the 19th July 1918.

Dr. S. N. Sen and Mr. N. Upadhya, for the Appellants.

Messrs. Iqbal Ahmad and Mukhtar Ahmad, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a defendants-vendees' appeal arising out of a suit for pre emption. The plaintiff came into Court seeking pre-emption on the basis of an alleged custom under which he had a right of pre emption. It has been found by the Court below that there has been a partition in the village and that the plaintiff is no longer a co-sharer of the vendors. The vendees equally are not co-sharers of the vendors. In spite of this fact, the Court below gave to the plaintiff a decree for pre-emption. The lower Appellate Court has found that, according to the custom, a karabatdar karibi, or a near relation, irrespective of the fact that he has no share in the mahal, has a right to pre-empt. It was found that the plaintiff is within seven degrees of one vendor and within eight degrees of another vendor. This fact he has held constitutes a karabatdar karibi that is a near relation, and has given the plaintiff a decree on this basis. It is only necessary to state the actual facts to see how erroneous this decision is. In the year 1860 a wajib ul-arz was drawn up in which the custom of pre emption was set forth giving the first right to a near co-sharer and after him to other co sharers in the thok. In 1872 there was another record made in the wajib ul-arz. On this occasion the right gave the first prior claim to karabatdar karibi, then to co-sharers in the same thok and then to co sharers in the other thoks. The custom as set out in the first wajib-ul-arz clearly gave no relations a right of pre-emption at all. The custom set out in the second wajib-ul-arz gave the right to relations irrespective of the fact that they own no share in the mahal. One wajib-ul-arz is dated 1860, the other is dated 1872, and these have been deemed good evidence of custom. Apart from this, even assuming that the near relation has a right to pre-empt, it is only by an immense stretch of imagination that we can hold that a relation seven or eight degrees removed is a near relation. He certainly does not come within the definition of karabatdar karibi. In our opinion the suit ought to have been dismissed. We allow the appeal. The plaintiffs' suit will stand dismissed with costs in all Courts.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The plaintiff sued for a declaration that the defendant, the Talukdari Settlement Officer of the Gujarat Prant, had no right to take from him possession of the field described in the plaint, and for a permanent injunction restraining the defendent from taking possession or causing it to be taken from him or from obstructing the plaintiff in any way. The property mentioned in the plaint is part of the Talukdari estate which had been settled in Jivai on a cadet branch of the Talukdari family. One Vakha in 1892 was the elder member of that cadet branch. He mortgaged the plaint property to the plaintiff, and his son Vaza joined in the mortgage. Vakha died in 1904 In 1905 Vaza executed a sale deed to the plaintiff of the property mortgaged in 1892. In 1908, the Talukdari Settlement Officer issued a notice directing him to give up possession. The learned District Judge has confirmed the decree of the lower Court which dismissed the suit.

In appeal, the first point that was taken was that Vakha and Vaza were not Talukdars within the meaning of section 31 (1) of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act, VI of 1888. That question, we think, has been decided by the decision of this Court in Thakarshi Trikam v. Ohudasama Akhubha (1) and we agree with the learned District Judge in thinking that that case cannot be distinguished from this case. The parties there were Bhayats, and so are they in this case. The only distinction that can be drawn between the two cases is that in Thakarshi Trikam's case (1) the whole village had been granted in Jivai, whereas in this case only a few fields. The fact remains that a grant was made in Jivai to cadets of the Talukdar's family, and they, therefore, must be considered as co-sharers and in the same position as Talukdars.

Then, it was argued that as Vaza was joint with his father, he had an interest in the Jivai property as if it were joint family property. We cannot agree with that argument. The land held in Talukdari tenure is totally distinct from land ordinarily held as joint family property by a Hindu family. It is not subject to the ordinarily law of inheritance or succession and we have only to refer to Part III of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act to see that partition of Talukdari land is governed by particular laws. It is only a person who has obtained a final decree of a Court of competent jurisdiction declaring him to be entitled to a share of a Talukdari estate, and every co sharer whose name has been recorded, as such, in the Settlement register prepared in accordance with section 5, who can be entitled to have his share divided from the rest of the estate. Then the subsequent sections enact how partitions should be effected. Therefore, I cannot think that in 1892 Vaza was a co sharer with his father in the Jivai property, and not having any interest in the property at the time, he was not competent to encumber the interest to which he might succeed on his father's death. Therefore, all that was mortgaged by the document of 1892 was the life-interest of Vakha, since Vakha was not competent owing to the provisions of section 31 (1) of Act VI of 1888 to enter into a valid mortgage beyond his lifetime. Then, it would follow that Vaza became entitled to the Jivai land on the death of his father, and there is no necessity to consider whether there was any equity between him and the mortgagee owing to his having been a party to the mortgage of 1892. But in 1905 he sold the property to the plaintiff. That clearly was an invalid alienation under section 31 (2) of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act. The Talukdari Settlement Officer, therefore, was entitled to issue notice under section 79A of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, read with section 33 (2) of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act.

It has been argued that, because Vaza became interested in the Jivai property before section 79A of the Land Revenue Code became applicable to alienations by Talukdars, therefore, notice cannot be given under that section. But section 79A of the Bombay Land Revenue Code refers to any person unauthorizedly occupying, or wrongfully in possession of, any land, and, therefore, it does not matter whether a person is in an unauthorized occupation of land before the date when the section became applicable. The question is whether, at the date of the notice, he is unauthorizedly occupying, or wrongfully in possession of the land and that we find was the case with the plaintiff in this case. Therefore, the Talukdari Settlement Officer was entitled to serve him with notice, and this suit, in which the plaintiff asked for a declaration that the Talukdari Settlement Officer has no right to take from him possession of the plaint property, fails and this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

HEATON, J.—I agree. It is quite plain that the plaintiff-appellant has acquired no vaild title in virtue of the alienation by Vaza in 1905, nor indeed has it been contended that he did acquire any good title by virtue of that alienation. The appellant's case before us rests on a mortgage of 1892. This was a mortgage by Vakha, the father of Vaza, and also by the latter. If the latter had an existing interest in the property, which is Jivai property, in 1892, no doubt he could have encumbered that existing interest. The mortgage itself was drafted as if it were an ordinary mortgage of ordinary joint family property in which a father and his son were interested and were effecting the mortgage. But the property which was mortgaged was not ordinary joint family property. It was Jivai property, and, as was held by this Court in Thakarshi Trikam v. Ohudasama Akhubha (1), the Jivaidar is a co-sharer in the Taluk-dari estate and as such a Talukdar. The Jivaidar in 1892 was Vakha. Having regard to the nature of Talukdari property, to the nature of the grants by Talukdars which come under the name of Jivai, and having regard to the provisions of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act, it seems to me that we must hold, as did the District Judge, that the only person entitled to deal with this Jivai property was the Jivaidar at the moment, and that was Vakha and not Vaza. This conclusion is fortified by the provisions of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act relating to partition. Vaza in 1892 was not a person who, according to the provisions of section 10 of that Act, had any right to have any interest or share partitioned on the ground that it was his. Holding, therefore, that Vaza at that time had no existing interest which he could part with, the fact that he joined in the execution of the mortgage-deed of that year makes no difference whatever to the interest which the mortgagee acquired. He only acquired such interest as the Jivaidar Vakha could mortgage to him. That mortgage ceased to have any effect from the date of Vakha's death in 1901. Thereafter, the possession of this property was possession contrary to the provisions of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act, and in particular contrary to the provisions of section 31 of that Act; and, therefore, the Talukdari Settlement Officer was empowered to issue a notice under section 79A of the Bombay Land Revenue Code which, in the year 1905 by Bombay Act II of that year, was made specifically applicable to the use or occupation of land in contravention of any of the provisions of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act. In my opinion, there is no doubt that the appeal was rightly decided by the Court of first appeal, and that we must dismiss the appeal before us.

(1) S. A. No. 438 of 1910, decided on 5th May 1911 (Unrep).

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 10, 105, 115—Order staying proceedings, nature of—Revision—High Court, power of—'Case," meaning of.

An application under section 10 of the Civil Procedure Code is not a case, and an order passed on such an application is not the decision of a case; consequently, the High Court has no power to interfere with such an order in the exercise of its revisional jurisdiction under section 115 of the Code [p. 91, cols 1 & 2]

The word "case" in section 115, though not confined to a suit, cannot be construed to mean an interlocutory order in a suit notwithstanding that the order may be of such a nature that it cannot be interfered with even under section 105 of the Code when an appeal is preferred from the final decree in the suit. [p. 91, col. 2.]

Civil revision against the order of the Munsif, Koil dated the 11th June 1919.

Mr. Pearey Lal Banerji, for the Applicant.

Mr. Panna Lal, for the Opposite Parties.

JUDGMENT.—This application for revision has arisen under the following circumstances. The plaintiff applicant brought a suit against the first two defendants for their ejectment from a house. These defendants contested the suit on the ground that they had already vacated the house and that there were other persons who had an interest in the disputed house. Subsequently, they presented an application to the Court praying that these other persons, whose names are Ishaq Ahmad and Ismail Ahmad, should be made defendants to the suit. This application was granted and the aforesaid persons were added as defendants. After issues were framed and a certain amount of evidence was recorded, the two persons aforesaid made an application to the Court to stay proceedings under section 10 of the Code of Civil Procedure, inasmuch as there had been a suit between them and the plaintiff and others in regard to the title of those defendants in respect of this and other property; that that suit had been decided by the Subordinate Judge and that an appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge was pending in the High Court. This application was granted and the Munsif made an order, apparently under section 10, staying proceedings until the decision of the appeal pending in the High Court. It is contended on behalf of the applicant-plaintiff, that the Court ought not to have stayed proceedings under section 10 and that that section was not applicable to the case. It seems to me that, upon the facts as alleged by the defendants and accepting the view that those defendants had an interest in the property, that circumstance would not preclude the plaintiff from maintaining the present suit. It was alleged that the principal defendants had entered into possession as tenants of the plaintiff. If that was so, it was not open to them to contest the title of the plaintiff, and it was wholly unnecessary to add Isbaq Ahmad and Ismail Ahmad as defendants. Furthermore, assuming that these persons had an interest in the house as held in the suit decided by the Subordinate Judge, the plaintiff urges that she, as one of the co-sharers or at least as Benamidar for her husband who has been held to be a co sharer, was entitled to maintain the suit for ejecting the principal defendants who, according to the plaintiff, were at the time of the suit mere trespassers. These, if established, would be valid grounds for disposing of the suit without staying proceedings for the final determination of the suit decided by the Subordinate Judge and now pending in appeal in the High Court. As already stated, the plaintiff, for the purposes of this suit, was prepared to admit the position that Isbaq Ahmad and Ismail Ahmad were part owners of the property subject to the payment of a certain sum of money which the decree of the Court had ordered them to pay. If that was the position, section 10 did not justify the Court in ordering proceedings to be stayed so as to keep the case pending in the Munsif's Court for about two years which would be the ordinary period after which the first appeal pending in this Court would be disposed of. This seems to me to be a case in which no order ought to have been passed under section 10; but the difficulty which arises is, has this Court power to interfere under section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure? The suit has not yet been decided and the order for stay is not a decision of the suit. Is it a "case" within the meaning of that section? I feel it very difficult to hold that it is a case apart from the suit pending in the Court below. It would be stretching language to hold that an application under section 10 is a case and an order passed on that application is the decision of a case. The word "case" in section 115 undoubtedly is not confined to a suit but it cannot, in my opinion, be construed to mean an interlocutory order in a suit although the order may be of such a nature that it cannot be interfered with even under the provisions of section 105 of the Code when an appeal is preferred from the final decree in the suit. The principle of the ruling of this Court in the case of Mohammad Ayub v. Mohammad Mahmood (1) seems to me to be applicable to this case. I have been referred to the recent ruling in the case of Bhargava & Co v. Jagan Nath Bhagwan Dass (2). With great respect, I find great difficulty in following the view adopted in that case. Moreover, the point raised in that case is not similar to that which arises in this case. I am, therefore, unable to hold that an application for revision lies in this case under section 115 and I must dismiss the application on this ground, at the same time, I would suggest to the learned Munsif the desirability of re-considering his order upon proper application being made to him and of hearing and disposing of the suit and not keeping it pending in his Court for another two years or so. I make no order as to costs.

BOMBAY HIGH COURT.
THE PARSI MATRIMONIAL SUIT No. 6 OF 1919.
July 20, 1920.
Present :—Mr. Justice Crump.
BAI AWABAI—PLAINTIFF
KHODADAD ARDESHER KOOCHABIOGI—DEFENDANT.
Parsi Marriage and Divorce Act (XV of 1865), ss.

BAI AWABAI v. KEODADAD ARDESHER KOOCHABIOGI.

7, 6, 8, 9 to 14 —Parsi marriage—Register, entry in, whether requisite for validity of marriage—Proof.

An entry in the register maintained under sections 6 to 14 of the Parsi Marriage and Divorce Act is not a requisite of the validity of a marriage under the Act. [p. 92, col. 2.]

Where no such entry has been made any other relevant evidence is admissible to prove the marriage. [p. 92, col. 2.]

Mr. K. N. Koyajee, for the Plaintiff.

JUDGMENT.—A novel point of law has arisen in this case and, at the express desire of the delegates who regard the matter as of importance to their community, I place on record my decision upon the point. The matter arose in this way. The petitioner, a Parsi lady, is suing for a divorce from her husband and the first issue is whether it is proved that the petitioner was lawfully married to the respondent. It so happens that no extract from the register maintained under sections 6 to 14 of Act XV of 1865 is forthcoming. The evidence is to the effect that a certificate was filled in as required by section 6, but when it was taken to the respondent to be signed he tore it up and refused to affix his signature. In these circumstances, the delegates have expressed some doubt as to whether the marriage can be held to be a vaild marriage, and have requested me to place my opinion upon record.

Turning to the Parsi Marriage and Divorce Act, it will be seen that the requisites to the validity of a Parsi marriage are laid down in section 3. Those requisites may be stated briefly as follows:—(1) the absence of any degree of consanguinity or affinity prohibited among Parsis; (2) the solemnization of the Asirvad ceremony by a Parsi priest in the presence of two Parsi witnesses; and (3) in the case of Parsis under the age of twenty-one years of age, the consent of father or guardian given previously to the marriage. It will be observed that the Legislature, in laying down these requisites for a valid marriage, has not included the registration of the marriage which is dealt with by subsequent sections of the Act. Turning to those sections, it will appear from section 6 that, immediately upon the solemnization of the marriage, a certificate is to be given by the officiating priest in the form contained in the schedule to the Act. The wording of the section shows that the certificate is given after the marriage has been contracted and solemnized, and, therefore, the certificate is not in itself one of the requisites for a valid marriage. I need not deal here with the contents of such certificate. I have already explained how, in this case, it came about that no valid certificate was actually drawn up.

The further directions of the law upon this point are that the certificate is to be sent to the Registrar who makes an entry in his register. And section 8, paragraph 2, lays down the effect of such an entry. It says that every such register shall be evidence of the truth of the statements therein contained. So far, it is clear that what the Legislature has in mind is to secure a proper record of marriages duly solemnized between Parsis. It is impossible to suppose that, if an entry in the register where a requisite to the validity of the marriage, the Legislature would have omitted to say so in section 3 which is plainly considered to be exhaustive upon this point.

The further sections dealing with the register, that is to say, sections 9 to 14, lay down certain penalties with reference to certain acts or omissions connected with the certificate or the register. The object of these penalties is to secure that this most desirable record of marriages shall be properly maintained. As in the case of all enactments of this nature, it is necessary to provide a penalty for failure to comply with any formality, if such formality is regarded of prime importance. Otherwise, in the ordinary course of human conduct, these formalities will not be complied with, and the object of the Legislature will not be secured.

Therefore, the conclusion at which I have arrived, and I do not think that the point is really a point of any doubt, is that the absence of any entry in the register would not affect the validity of the marriage. The only way in which it would affect a suit under the Act would be as regards the manner of proof. Here, where there was no certificate, and, therefore, there was no entry in the register, it is plain that any other relevant evidence is admissible. How the case would stand had there been an entry in the register which was, for some cause or other, not available is a matter on which it is not necessary for me to pronounce any opinion in this case, though I may say that, on proper proof that it was not possible to produce the register, there would appear to be no difficulty as to the admission of secondary evidence.

Custom—Pre-emption—Involuntary sale—Custom, whether applicable—Sale by public auction—Co-sharers with full notice of sale not bidding or attempting to purchase, effect of—Refusal to purchase—Vendor, duty of.

A village custom as to pre-emption refers only to a voluntary sale by one co-sharer of his property and has no application whatever to the case of an involuntary sale carried out against his wishes by a Court through a Collector, or an Official Assignee, or any body else. [p. 95, col. 2.]

Where in the case of an involuntary sale by public auction of the estate of a co-sharer the other co-sharers have full notice of the intended sale and do not bid for the property or attempt to purchase it, their action is tantamount to a refusal to purchase. [p. 95, col. 2.]

Where a property has been offered to a co-sharer at a certain price and he has refused to purchase, or to purchase it at that price, it is no longer incumbent upon the vendor to give him a second chance when he has once found a purchaser for the property at the price at which he offerd it to his co-sharer, or a higher one. First appeal from the decision of the First Additional Subordinate Judge, Aligarh, dated the 26th September 1916.

JUDGMENT.—This and the connected appeal No. 27 of 1917 arise out of two suits for pre-empion brought by two pre emptors Hardeo Sahai and Sheoharan Singh, on the basis of a sale, dated the 8th December 1914. The facts of the case are as follows:—

One Rai Bahadur Sri Kishen Das was the owner of the property in dispute which is a 15-biswas share in the village of Gokalpur Piplot. This man became insolvent. One of his creditors applied to the Bombay High Court and, on the 26th September 1913, he was adjudged an insolvent. His entire property, including the property in dispute, was vested in the Official Assignee of Bombay. That officer decided to sell the property now in dispute by public auction through Messrs. Crawford and Company, Auctioneers of Bombay. The sale was originally fixed by the auctioneers for the 25th October 1914 at Aligarh. The village in question is a village lying in the Aligarh District. It was not, however, carried out on that date and the 8th November 1914 was fixed for it. On the 8th of November the sale was held but the Official Assignee refused to accept the bid made and the property was ordered to be again put up for auction. The 6th December 1914 was fixed for the sale. The affidavit filed by the auctioneer Allbless in the High Court at Bombay, in proceedings which were subsequently taken there by one Sheoraj Singh, shows that the sale was advertised in local papers at Delhi, Aligarh, Cawnpore and Lucknow. Also, that hand-bills were prepared and circulated so as to give as wide publicity as possible to the impending auction. It has also been established in the case that the sale was notified in the Aligarh District Gazette. At the auction on the 6th December the highest bid was that of Sheoraj Sirgh for Rs 40,000. The sale was subject to confirmation by the Receiver. Apparently, other persons, before that confirmation could be made, made other offers to the auctioneer of Rs. 40,500 and Rs 41,000, the latter baing by the present defendants-appellants. These offers were communicated to Sheoraj Singh and he was given an opportunity of making a higher bid if he wished to do so. He was allowed up to 11 30 on the 8th December 1914 for this purpose. Within the time allotted he failed to make any offer and so the sale to the defendants-appellants was confirmed by the Official Assignee and the sale was closed.

Sheoraj Singh, subsequently, wished to make another offer but he was told that it was too late. He went down to Bombay and there in the High Court he objected to the sale in favour of the defendants and asked the Court to set it aside. This, the Court refused to do and his objections were disallowed. The sale was thus clearly confirmed by the High Court in Bombay.

The two present plaintiffs, Hardeo Sahai and Sheobaran Singh, who are co-sharers in the village, took no objection whatsoever in the High Court in Bombay to the sale in favour of the defendants-appellants. The sale-deed in favour of the defendants-appellants was executed on the 22nd February 1915, it was registered on the 8th March 1915. The two present plaintiffs waited until the 8th March 1916, the extreme limit of the period of limitation, and then they brought the two present suits to pre-empt the property. They based their claim on village custom according to which, they pleaded that, they had a prior right of purchase, the defendants being strangers to the village. They sought to pre-empt the property for the sum of Rs. 18,000. Each claimed the whole property. Each was made party to the suit brought by the other. The Official Assignee was made a party to the case but was subsequently exempted from the suit.

The defendants denied that there was any custom of pre-emption in the village at all. They further pleaded that the custom, if any, could not operate in the circumstances of the present case, as the sale was by order of a Court. They further maintained that the full sale consideration of Rs. 41,000 should be paid by the pre emptors if they had a right.

The lower Court found that the custom of pre-emption prevailed and that, in the circumstances, the plaintiffs were entitled to exercise their right of pre emption. He found that Rs. 35,000 was the true consideration for the property and also expressed his opinion that these two suits had really been brought by Sheoraj Singh in the name of these two plaintiffs in order that he might get hold of the property which he could not obtain through his objections made in the Bombay High Court.

The defendants have appealed. The points pressed before us are, first of all, that there is no custom of pre emption.

Secondly, that if there be any custom it cannot operate in the circumstances of the present case, the property having been sold by compulsory sale under the order of the Court. Thirdly, that if the custom does apply, still the two plaintiffs had sufficient notice of the sale; that they did not attempt to offer any bids at the auction-sale though one of them was present through his agent, and that, therefore, they have lost their right to a decree for pre-emption by reason of their refusal to purchase.

No objection has been taken to the amount of Rs. 35,000 fixed by the Court below For the purposes of our decision, we may assume that the custom of pre-emption does exist in this village though we by no means hold so. It seems to us that, assuming that the custom is as set out in the wajib ul arz, such a custom has no application to the circumstances of the present case. The wajib ul arz merely sets out that each co-sharer has a right to sell his property to whomsoever he pleases but that he should transfer it first to a co-sharer who is the descendant of a common ancestor and in case of refusal on his part to other co-sharers in the village and if they also do not take then to any one he may like. If there is any dispute between the transferor and the person having a right of pre emption as to the amount of price, then it will be decided with reference to the rate at which property is sold in the neighbourhood. Now, in the circumstances of the present case, this being the custom it is clear that no co-sharer has sold his share at all. The owner of the property, Rai Bahadur Sri Kishen Das, was declared an insolvent not on his own application but on the application of one of his creditors and, apparently, against his will. His property, seized and taken from him by the Court, was made over to an Official Assignee, who thereupon set to work to realise his assets and distribute them among his creditors. It seems to us not only impossible but absurd to hold that the custom set out in the wajib-ul arz, if there be one, could ever have been intended to apply to circumstances such as these. It is true that in sales carried out by a Court in execution of decrees if a co-sharer is present at the auction and bids an equal amount with the next highest bidder, he is entitled, under the Civil Procedure Code, to take the property. But it is necessary for him to attend and to bid and to claim his right there and then It is also true that under the rules of procedure such compulsory sales take place after public proclamation which is taken to be sufficient notice to the pre-emptors along with the public to come forward and purchase the property. It seems to us that these remarks apply with equal force to the circumstances of the present case, where the Receiver publicly notifies the intended sale, fixes a date and invites the public including all pre emptors to attend and to exercise their rights. In the present case we have it clearly proved that on the 6th December the date fixed for the auction Murari Lal, the agent of the plaintiff Sheobaran Singh, was actually present at the sale. His nephew and his nephew's son were also present. Karan Singh actually bid for the property as also did Kalyan Singh. Murari Lal, the agent, could have, if he had wished to do so, made bids on behalf of his master. He is a person who holds a general power of attorney from Sheobaran Singh. He made no bids whatsoever. As for the plaintiff Hardeo Sahai he did not appear at all either in person or by agent. Out of sixteen persons whose presence at the sale was noted, eight at least were either co-sharers of the village or persons connected with the village so that it is evident that the notification of the sale by the auctioneers on behalf of the Official Assignee had been a very thorough one and ample notice had been given, and that the plaintiff who was vicariously present made no attempt to exercise his right to purchase the property. We have not the slightest doubt that they received ample notice of the sale and we have no doubt whatsoever that Murari Lal attended the sale on behalf of his master. There has, therefore, in the present case been no difference whatsoever practically between the procedure adopted in the case of a sale in execution of a decree and the procedure adopted in the present case. The sale was a sale against the wish of the owner by the Court, a compulsory sale. It was duly notified and one of which we are satisfied that the plaintiffs-appellants had full knowledge. They neither of them bid for the property or attempted to purchase it.

S. N. DAR... LL. B.,
SRINAGAR (Kashmir)

Our attention has been called to a decision of a Bench of this Court in Kanhai Lal v. Kalka Prasad (1). We may point out that there is one material difference between that case and the present case. In that case no public auction whatsoever was held, no opportunity was given to the pre-emptors to come forward and bid. There was a private sale carried out by the Collector. The two cases are, therefore, not on all fours. The one is, therefore, no authority for the other, although we may say we find it difficult to accept the correctness of the decision in that case. We find it impossible to hold the view that a village custom which refers only to a voluntary sale by one co-sharer of his property can in any way apply to the case of an involuntary sale carried out against his wishes by a Court through a Collector or an Official Assignee or any body else. The custom clearly never contemplated circumstances such as these. We, therefore, think that the custom, assuming it to exist, does not apply to the circumstances of the present case and that the plaintiffs' suit on this ground at least ought to have been dismissed, But over and above that we think that the plaintiffs are out of Court for another reason. They had full notice of the intention of sale. They were publicly invited to the auction. One did not appear, the other appeared through an agent and made no attempt to purchase. This action on their part was, in our opinion, tantamount to a refusal to purchase and if it was necessary for the Official Assignee to follow the custom laid down in the wajib-ul arz he actually did follow that custom for he publicly invited these co sharers to purchase and they publicly refused to purchase.

We are asked to held that, even after such a sale as this, it was incumbent upon the Official Assignee to offer the property to the pre-emptors at the price fixed upon between him and the other purchaser, and we are asked to adopt the view which was also expressed on this point in Kanhai Lal v. Kalka Prasad (1). The more recent decisions of this Court differ from the ruling quoted and we see no reason to go back to the old opinion that was held. We think that, where a property has been offered to a co-sharer at a certain price and he has refused to purchase or to purchase it at that price, it is no longer incumbent upon the vendor to go back to him and give him a second chance when he has once found a purchaser for the property at the price at which he offered it to his co-sharer, or a higher one. There are several rulings on this point and we see no reason to go behind the more recent rulings of this Court and refer to an old opinion which is no longer held in this Court. In the present case, it is true, that the actual sale made was carried out on the 8th December, two days after the auction-sale of December the 6th, but that sale was for a price still higher than what was bid on December the 6th and on December the 6th the two plaintiffs had clearly by their actions notified their refusal to purchase at all much less at a higher price than Rs. 40,000.

The point is raised by the appellants that the suits are barred by limitation. We do not think there is any force in that contention. The property is clearly one which is not capable of physical possession. The registration took place on the 8th of March 1915 and the suits having been brought on the 8th of March 1916 were clearly within time. We think, however, that the plaintiffs' suits ought to have been dismissed on the two other points which we have already discussed above. We agree with the Court below that these are not bona fide suits but have been brought by the plaintiffs for the benefit of Sheoraj Singh. Hardeo Sahai is a man of straw. Sheobaran Singh did not attempt to purchase when he had the opportunity. We, therefore, allow the appeals and set aside the decrees of the Court below. The plaintiffs' suits will stand dismissed with costs in both Courts.

Adverse possession—Decree against person in possession, effect of—Tacking period of possession, subsequent to decree to that previous to decree, whether permissible.

The period of adverse possession is calculated for the benefit of the party setting up adverse possession and if a decree is passed against him then there is an end of that period, and he must, if he wishes to acquire a good title by adverse possession, start afresh after the decree. [p 97, col. 1.]

It would, however, require very strong evidence on the part of a losing party to acquire a fresh title by adverse possession against the decree of a Court and he must act in such a way that the parties interested could have no doubt whatever with regard to his motives in order that they might be enabled to take proper steps to stop time from running. [p. 97, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Ahmednagar, in Appeal No. 52 of 1917, reversing the decree passed by the Subordinate Judge at Ahmednagar, in Civil Suit No. 1165 of 1912.

Mr. S. R. Bakhale, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiffs brought this suit to establish their sole right to manage the Devasthan of Usthal, alleging hereditary right and ancient and immemorial custom, against defendants Nos. 1 and 4 as representing a Board of Management elected by various co-sharers under the Collector's order of 23rd March 1908. This question appears to have been decided against the plaintiffs by a decree of the High Court in Suit No. 96 of 1893 which was passed on the 7th July 1896. Apparently, after the decree was passed, the plaintiffs remained in possession, and nothing was actually done by the other side to get into possession until the Collector's order of the 1st August 1908.

It is suggested, in the first place, that the plaintiff can tack on the period of adverse possession before the decree in Suit No. 96 of 1893 to the period after the decree, so that they acquired an absolute title after twelve years from the date of the original possession. That is an argument which we cannot accede to. The period of adverse possession is calculated for the benefit of the party setting up adverse possession, and if he loses, then there is an end of that period, and he must, if he wishes to acquire a good title by adverse possession, start afresh after the decree. But we cannot presume, since the decree was passed by the High Court on the 7th July 1896, that the plaintiffs in this suit dertemined at once to hold adversely to the successful party, and in effect in contempt of the decree of the High Court. It is quite possible, after the decree had been passed and after the successful party was so remiss in seeking to execute it, the plaintiffs might have gathered fresh courage, and might have, after a certain period had elapsed from the date of the decree, determined to set up again a title in themselves against the successful party in that suit. But we have no evidence of that and certainly there is no evidence that they took that attitude before the 1st August 1908. But we think that it would require very strong evidence indeed on the part of a losing party to acquire a fresh title by adverse possession against the decree of the High Court or of any Court, and he would certainly have to act in such a way that the parties interested could have no doubt whatever with regard to his motives in order that they might be enabled to take proper steps to stop time from running. But in this case although the execution of the decree in Suit No. 96 of 1893 was barred by time yet as laid down by the late Chief Justice in Bala Kushaba v. Abai Amrita (1) although the remedy may be barred the right remains. We, therefore, think that the decision of the learned District Judge was correct. The appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Dr. S. N. Sen and Mr. Damodar Das, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of the case have been fully set forth in the judgments of the Courts below and need not be repeated here at length. The plaintiff-respondent is a mortgagee who had obtained a decree for sale and later on became the purchaser of the property in dispute in execution of of his own decree. After this decree had been passed, certain partition proceedings, which had been pending from before, resulted in a partition under which, according to the plaintiff, lands of very inferior quality were allotted to the mortgagor-judgment-debtor, and lands of superior quality were placed in the shares of his other co sharers. The plaintiff obtained formal possession over the undivided share of his judgment-debtor which had been mortgaged to him. This was on the 19th of June 1914 and the partition proceedings were completed on the 24th of June 1914. It appears, however, that when the plaintiff wanted to reap the advantages which accrued to him from the purchase of the undivided half-share belonging to his judgment-debtor, the defendant interfered and set up the partition which had been effected behind the plaintiff's back. The plaintiff then brought the present suit for a declaration that he was entitled to possession of a half undivided share, and that the partition was not binding upon him and was fraudulent. He also claimed actual possession and damages. The defence, amongst other pleas, was that the partition was not fraudulent, that the suit was not maintainable because it offended against the provisions of section 233 (k) of the Revenue Act. The Subordinate Judge came to the conclusion that the suit was not barred by the provisions of the Land Revenue Act, II of 1901, and his finding has been left untouched by the lower Appellate Court and has not been challenged in appeal before us. He, however, found that it had not been shown that the judgment-debtor and his co-sharers colluded together to defeat the plaintiff's rights, and, therefore, the partition could not be interfered with, and dismissed the suit. On appeal by the plaintiffs the District Judge came to the conclusion that it had been proved beyond all possible doubt that Nanu (the mortgagor), Bansi and Khubi, his co-sharers, conspired to defraud the plaintiff and to that end effected a fraudulent exchange of land under the guise of a partition amongst themselves. He also found that the partition was a bogus one and it could not in any way effect the plaintiff's rights and decreed the plaintiff's claim for recovery of possession, dismissing that for mesne profits. Some of the defendants, including the mortgagor, come here in second appeal and raise various points. The first and the last grounds of appeal have not been at all touched upon by the learned Counsel for the appellant in his argument. The second ground has not been pressed either. The case, however, which has been strongly pressed before us in argument comes to this that the plaintiff was not entitled to a decree because he had not shown that he had been in any way damnified by this fraudulent partition, and reliance has been placed on a large number of cases dealing with the subject. This case which resembles the present most closely is that of Mahadeo Prasad v. Takia Bibi (1). The only distinction [illegible], is that in that case the purchase by the mortgagee-decree-holder was made after the partition had been carried out, whereas in the present case the purchase was made before the partition was completed. If this distinction could make any difference at all, it would be one in favour of the plaintiff-respondent. The argument put forward before us, shortly, comes to this that the plaintiff has made a good bargain in so far as his purchase of the other items of the mortgaged property is concerned, and that the plaintiff could not be damnified because he had not taken into consideration the profit which he has made out of the other purchase. The learned Counsel could not show us any authority under which we could compel the plaintiff to give an account of the other purchase. So far as the judgments of the Courts below go, this point does not seem to have been touched upon nor does it appear to have been raised anywhere, so that we are not in a position to state whether there was any justification for this statement. Then it was contended, on the strength of the ruling aforesaid, that we ought to remit an issue to find out whether the plaintiff had been in any way damnified, and, if so, what relief he was entitled to; but having regard to the finding of fact referred to above, namely, that the partition was a bogus one, having been brought about to defeat the plaintiffs' claim, and that by virtue of that partition the defendant-mortgagor got lands of much inferior quality than he would have been entitled to if the partition had been fair and above-board, we do not see how any question remains still to be decided. It is clear, and more than clear, from the above finding that the plaintiff has been damnified. We think there is no force in this appeal. We, therefore, dismiss this appeal with costs including in this Court-fees on the higher scale.

Stamp Act (II of 1899), ss. 26, 35—Object and construction of Act—Scope of s. 35—Mining lease bearing stamp of certain value—Royalty, whether can be recovered beyond the value covered by stamp on payment of penalty.

Unlike the Evidence Act, the Stamp Act does not base its rules on theories of relevancy or of public policy. It is purely fiscal and insists that certain documents shall pay a contribution to the State according to the purpose for which they were executed. In regard to certain documents which create a right to money it prescribes that unless the stamp is proportionate to the valuation of the claim the document shall be inadmissible in evidence, and where the intention of the parties is that the valuation shall be unlimited it enacts by section 26 that the claimant will be entitled to realise a sum proportionate to the stamp fee paid, subject to certain exceptions in the case of royalties on coal. It follows that wherever the claim exceeds the amount proportionate to the stamp the document is not duly stamped for the purpose for which it was executed within the meaning of section 35 of the Stamp Act, and the provisions of the section would apply thereto. [p. 104, col. 2.]

There is nothing in the words of section 35 of the Stamp Act which necessarily excludes its operation from cases covered by section 26 of the Act. [p. 104, col. 1.]

Where a mining lease bears a stamp of a certain value, the lessor's right to recover royalty is not confined to the amount covered by the stamp; if it is found that he is entitled to a greater amount he can be given a decree for the sum to which he is entitled on compliance with the provisions of section 35 of the Stamp Act. ### JUDGMENT.

MILLER, C. J.—In this case both the plaintiff and the defendants have preferred appeals numbered respectively 28 and 30 of 1918 from the judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge of Purulia, dated the 27th September 1917.

The suit out of which the appeals arise was instituted on the 6th March 1917 by the plaintiff as lessor against the defendants as lessees of 32 bighas of coal land, situate in Mouza Jharia, claiming royalty and commission on coal raised from the land in question for the years 1911 to 1916. The lease under which the plaintiff claims is dated the 14th December 1906. The land is demised for a term of 999 years in consideration of a sum of Rs. 1,920 Salami, subject to certain conditions as to payment of royalty and commission. By the terms of the lease it is provided that the lessees shall be bound to pay commission at the rate of 5 annas per ton on all sorts of coal, including dust, which shall be raised from the mine and despatched by rail or sold or otherwise disposed of at the mouth of the pit. The commission is payable by four quarterly instalments during the year and arrears bear interest at 1 per cent per mensem. There is also a provision for a minimum royalty of Rs. 960 per annum payable by the lessees even if the commission at 5 annas per ton falls short of that amount. The document was stamped with a revenue stamp of Rs. 40 of which Rs. 20 is payable in respect of the Salami and the balance for the estimated amount of the average yearly commission, which on a stamp of that value would be Rs. 2,000. The plaintiff was unable to give particulars of the actual quantity of coal raised from the mine during the six years in question but he valued his claim at Rs. 39,000, an amount which on the evidence turned out to be excessive. His case was that, by the terms of the lease, he was entitled to commission on all coal raised from the mine whether despatched by rail or sold at the pit's mouth or whether appropriated by the lessees for their own purposes in connection with the working of the mine.

The defendants contended that they were not liable under the terms of the lease for commission on the coal used by them for furnaces of the boilers and for other purposes connected with the working of the mine but only for such coal as was raised and actually despatched by rail or sold or otherwise transferred locally. They further contended that as the stamp on the lease was Rs. 20 only in respect of commission the plaintiff was precluded by section 2[illegible] of the Stamp Act from claiming any commission beyond that which was proportionate to the amount of the stamp and could not cure the defect by payment of a penalty under section 35 of the Act in such a case.

It should be mentioned that the plaintiff had previously sued the same defendants for commission in respect of coal used by them for their own purposes during the years 1908 to 1911. For those years commision had been paid on the coal despatched by rail or sold locally but the plaintiff claimed in addition commission on the coal consumed by the lessees themselves for the purposes mentioned. That case had been tried by the learned Subordinate Judge before whom the present case came and had been decided by him a few months earlier dismissing the plaintiff's claim for such commission and he decided the same issue in the present case in the same manner holding that the plaintiff was entitled to commission only on the coal despatched by rail or sold locally; and, assessing the commission for the years in question in the present case upon the coal actually sold, he gave the plaintiff a decree for Rs. 20,622-5-9. If the plaintiff's contention is right that he is entitled to commission on all coal raised, it is admitted that the amount awarded should be increased by Rs. 3,320.

With regard to the defendants contention that the plaintiff is not entitled to claim any commission beyond that proportionate to the value of the stamp the learned Judge decided that, under section 35 of the Stamp Act the plaintiff was entitled, upon paying the deficit duty and penalty, amounting in all to Rs. 1,920, to enforce his contract to the full amount of the commission payable under the lease. If, on the other hand, the defendants' contention is right, the plaintiff would only be entitled to commission at the rate of Rs. 2,000 per annum which for the six years in question amounts to Rs. 12,000 instead of Rs. 20,622 5-9.

In Appeal No. 28 of 1918 the plaintiff is the appellant and contends that the learned Judge was wrong in refusing to award him commission upon the coal used by the defendants. In the previous suit in which a similar claim was made for the years 1903 to 1911 and dismissed by the learned Judge an appeal numbered 187 of 1917 was preferred to this Court by the plaintiff against that decision. In that appeal the plaintiff and defendants were the same parties and the question for determination was the same question and arose under the same lease. It was heard before this Bench a few days ago and was decided against the plaintiff-appellant. It is unnecessary to repeat again our reasons for arriving at that conclusion. The question is one of the interpretation of the terms of the lease and we decided that no commission was payable by the lessees on coal consumed at the colliery by them for the purposes of the colliery. The plaintiff's appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

In Appeal No. 20 of 1918 the defendants are the appellants and contend that the learned Judge was not justified, in view of the provisions of section 26 of the Stamp Act, in awarding the plaintiff any commission in excess of an amount proportionate to the value of the stamp viz., Rs. 2,000 per annum.

Section 26 provides,—"Where the amount or value of the subject-matter of any instrument chargeable with ad valorem duty cannot be ascertained at the date of its execution or first execution nothing shall be claimable under such instrument more than the highest amount or value for which, if stated in an instrument of the same description, the stamp actually used would, at the date of such execution, have been sufficient". There is a proviso to that section relating to the case of a lease of a mine in which royalty or a share of the produce is received as the rent or part of the rent and it is provided in the case of such a lease, granted by any person other than the Secretary of State in Council, that it shall be sufficient to have estimated such royalty or value of such share for the purpose of stamp duty at Rs. 20,000 a year and in such a case the whole amount of such royalty or share shall be claimable under such lease. The duty payable upon leases is contained in Article 35 of Schedule I of the Act. Clause (c) of that Article is applicable to the present case, i.e., where the lease is granted for a fine or premium or for money advanced in addition to rent reserved. In such a case the duty is the same as on a conveyance for a consideration equal to the amount or value of such fine or premium or advance as set forth in the lease in addition to the duty which would have been payable on such lease if no fine or premium or advance had been paid or delivered. A conveyance for a consideration of Rs. 1,920 would require a Re. 20 stamp and in addition where the lease, as in the present case, purports to be for a term in excess of three years under Article 35 (iii) a further duty is payable equal to that of a conveyance for a consideration equal to the amount or value of the average annual rent reserved. A further Rs. 20 was paid in respect to the average annual value which, in the case of a conveyance, would represent a consideration of Rs. 2,000. It would appear, therefore, that under section 26 of the Stamp Act nothing is claimable under the instrument in question beyond the amount or value for which the stamp is sufficient. The duty payable in the case of a lease where a rent or royalty is reserved is undoubtedly an ad valorem duty. In the case of a mining lease, however, where the royalty must necessarily be a matter of uncertainty the parties must estimate what they consider to be the average annual value. They may estimate it at any amount they please, but in order to protect the revenue section 26 provides that nothing shall be claimable in such a case beyond the highest amount or value for which the stamp is sufficient subject, however, to the proviso that if a stamp is paid commensurate with an annual value of Rs. 20,000 (which in the case of a lease would be a Re. 200 stamp) then the whole amount shall be claimable whether it exceeds Rs. 20,000 or not. The lessor, therefore, has the option of choosing his own stamp-duty in such a case and if he wished to protect himself from the limitation of the section he should take care to see that the stamp paid is sufficient to cover the maximum amount which he may be likely to become entitled to by way of royalty under the lease. If he deliberately chooses to pay a duty of less than Rs. 200 (the maximum amount) he must always run the risk of being debarred from exercising his claim against the lessee for the full amount of royalty payable under the instrument, and, in the face of the express provisions of the section, he has nobody but himself to blame for such a contingency.

The plaintiff contends, however, that under section 35 of the Act the Court had power, as the Subordinate Judge held, to enable him to enforce his claim for the full amount recoverable under the instrument, by exacting the penalty therein mentioned. That section provides that,—"No instrument chargeable with duty shall be admitted in evidence for any purpose by any person having by law or consent of parties authority to receive evidence, or shall be acted upon, registered or authenticated by any such person or by any public officer, unless such instrument is duly stamped". But the proviso to that section, upon which the plaintiff relies, enacts that any such instrument, with certain exceptions not material to the present case, shall be admitted in evidence on payment of the duty with which the same is chargeable, or, in the case of an instrument insufficiently stamped, of the amount required to make up such duty, together with a penalty of 10 times the amount of the duty or deficiency.

The learned Counsel for the defendants contends that the proviso is not applicable to the present case. His argument is, that it cannot be said that the instrument was not admissible in evidence or could not be acted upon unless registered or authenticated by any public officer. It was a perfectly valid instrument for all purposes subject to the limitation contained in section 26, a limitation which must be deemed to have been accepted by the lessor by his own deliberate act and at his own option, and the law does not require that the instrument in question shall bear a stamp of any greater value than that which it actually bears and hence it cannot be said that the instrument is not duly stamped according to law. Section 35, he argues, only applies to those instruments which are either unstamped or not duly stamped and has no application to the present case. The stamp was an optional stamp and the lessor must abide by his option.

I confess that I was impressed by this argument put forward by Mr. Hasan Imam on behalf of the defendants. In support of it he referred to the case of Syed Keramut Ali v. Moonshee Abdool Wahab (1). That was a case under the Stamp Act of 1860. It was a suit brought by the mutwalee of the Hooghly Imambara against the treasurer of that endowment and his sureties for a sum of Rs. 17,250 alleged to have been misappropriated by the treasurer. The security-bond was executed on an optional stamp of Rs. 8. It was held that no larger sum could be recovered under section 14 of the Act of 1860 upon a bond executed upon an optional stamp than that optional stamp covered (in that case Rs. 1,000) and that no amount of penalty could make up the deficiency in the stamp. The predecessor of the Subordinate Judge in the first instance had permitted the plaintiff to pay the penalty, but on protest made on the part of the sureties the judgment of the Court was reserved on that point, viz., whether the plaintiff could recover more than the amount covered by the stamp. The Subordinate Judge, on perusal of the 13th and 14th sections of Act XXXVI of 1860, held it to be illegal for a Civil Court to pass an order for the recovery of a sum in excess of the amount which may be received on the strength of a document engrossed upon an optional stamp. He considered that clause 6 of section 13 of that Act provided that when documents are engrossed upon insufficiently stamped or on unstamped paper the sum paid as penalty, is to make up the deficiency in stamp but that there was no provision to the effect that the deficiency should be made up by the exaction of a penalty in the case of a document engrossed upon an optional stamp. On appeal to the High Court the decision of the Subordinate Judge was affirmed. Section 14 of the Act of 1860 provided that "No larger sum shall be recovered in any Court of Justice by reason of any deed, instrument, or writing for which an optional stamp is indicated to be proper by the said schedule, than the largest sum for which, if specially stated in a deed, instrument or writing of the same denomination, the stamp actually used under the option so given would be of sufficient value. And no such deed, instrument or writing shall be held by any Court of Justice to be valid in respect to any sum of money larger than that for which the stamp on the said deed, instrument or writing would be sufficient." But section 13 of the Act then in force, which enabled the Court to admit the instrument on payment of a penalty, referred to documents executed on insufficient or unstamped paper from accident, ignorance, inadvertence, mistake or other unavoidable cause. The High Court considered that as the document was neither unstamped or insufficiently stamped from accident, ignorance, inadvertence, mistake or other unavoidable cause it was not covered by the provisions of section 13 and that no larger sum could be recovered by reason of section 14 than was commensurate with the optional stamp on the document. It is further to be noticed that in that case no actual figure was mentioned in the bond as the amount for which the sureties would be liable, the only indication of the limit of the liability being the stamp. That case can hardly be regarded as an authority on the interpretation of section 35 of the present Act which differs materially from section 13 of the Act of 1860. Under the present Act, the Court has power to cure the defect in an insufficiently stamped document whether the insufficiency is due to mere inadvertence or accident or not, and if it can be held that the provisions of section 26 are subject to the Court's power of interference under section 35 it would not matter that the value of the stamp was the result of mature deliberation.

On the other hand, the plaintiff relied upon later decisions which incline towards the view that a deficiency in the value of the stamp can be cured by payment of a penalty even where the value is optional. In 1881 the case of Collector of Tanjore v. Ramasamier (2) was decided under the Stamp Act of 1869. The instrument in question was an ijara lease, the rent reserved being a portion of the produce, the value of which varied from year to year. The document was stamped as a lease with a Rs. 4 stamp which was the proper stamp for a value of Rs. 800. For the first year Rs. 824 had been paid by the defendant. The plaintiff sued to recover rent for a subsequent period and it was objected that he was not entitled to recover more than the amount covered by the stamp. As the price of grain had risen his claim exceeded Rs. 800 per annum. The Subordinate Judge considered that the plaintiff could not recover more than the amount recovered for the first year and dismissed his suit for the balance. Under the provisions of the Act then in force the stamp had to be calculated upon the estimated value of the first year's rent and not as at present upon the average annual value. On appeal to the High Court it was decided that as the Act then in force directed the parties to have regard to the rent reserved in the first year as determining the proper stamp duty the penalty for an insufficient estimate should attach only to the obligation for that year and that sufficient effect would be given to section 26 of the Act of 1879 by holding that in the first year of the term no more could be recovered than the amount on which the stamp duty was computed, but that in any subsequent year the amount recoverable was to be determined by the terms of the instruments. It was not necessary, therefore, to determine whether the deficiency could be cured by payment of a penalty. The basis of the decision, however, cannot apply in the present case where the royalty must be calculated not on the amount payable in the first year but on the average annual value.

In 1886 in Mulji Bechar v. Jetha Jeshankar (3), the Chief Justice and two other Judges of the Bombay High Court, on a reference by the Subordinate Judge under section 49 of the Stamp Act of 1879, decided that a document written on a stamp of one anna was good under clause 2 of section 12, Regulation XVIII of 1827, but that the plaintiff could not obtain on it a judgment for a sum or value beyond what was covered by the stamp. They held, however, that there was nothing to prevent the Court from allowing him to obtain judgment for a larger sum by paying an additional stamp duty and penalty.

In 1906 in the case of Nathu Gangaram v. Hansraj Morarji (4) it was stated by Russell, J., that the effect of section 35 of the Stamp Act of 1899 was that, when any instrument, not being one of those excepted in sub-section (a), is tendered in Court, the Court is to accept it and shall admit it as evidence on payment of the duty; and the person tendering it is entitled to compel the Court to accept the instrument if the duty and penalty are paid, there being nothing in the section which prevents an instrument which is not absolutely rejected or which comes within the exception from being admitted on payment of penalty. That was a case in which it was held that an ad valorem stamp duty was necessary for the instrument in question which was an assignment of a chose in-action the value of which could not presumably be definitely ascertained. No objection, however, appears to have been taken that section 26 was a bar to the operation of section 35.

One other case may be referred to which was relied on by the learned Subordinate Judge in support of the decision at which he arrived, namely, the case of Gomez v. Young (5), decided in 1869. The immediate question for determination was whether a promissory note sufficiently stamped to cover the principal sum due but not the interest was admissible in evidence. Phear, J., decided that it was not and rejected it. On appeal Sir Barnes Peacock, C. J., took a contrary view with which McPherson, J. agreed. In the course of his judgment the learned Chief Justice is reported to have said —"I should be very sorry to see justice defeated by holding that a man is to lose his whole claim by making a mistake as to the construction to be put upon the Indian Act, when the construction put upon it is in accordance with the construction which has been put upon similar words in the English Statute. The greatest injustice might be caused if we were to hold that the plaintiff should lose his whole claim simply because he made such a mistake." The decision is not a direct authority upon the question under consideration, but, I ventrue to think, it correctly expresses the attitude which the Courts should endeavour to adopt in dealing with the Stamp Act in its effect upon the contractual obligations created between the parties. Section 27 requires the consideration and other facts affecting the chargeability of any instrument to be set forth therein. In dealing with a similar provision in the English Statute, "No case that I know", said Lindley, L. J. "can be cited to shew that that part of the Act is otherwise than directory or that a mis-stated consideration would invalidate a deed". Powell v. London & Provincial Bank (6). The object of the Stamp Act is not to alter the terms of the bargain between the parties but to protect the revenue by excluding proof of the bargain by an instrument unduly stamped. By denying the benefit of section 35 in the case of mining leases requiring an ad valorem stamp when the value can only be estimated the revenue would gain nothing. In fact it would suffer loss. The only person benefited would be the lessee who would escape a part of the obligation which by his contract he undertook to bear. Section 35 provides the means by which, in the case of the estimate proving deficient, the revenue can be amply protected and the terms of the bargain can be proved and given effect to. I can find nothing in the words of section 35 which necessarily excludes its operation from cases covered by section 26. It would be a strange result, which the Legislature could hardly have intended, if an instrument bearing nostamp and, therefore, not admissible in evidence under section 35, could be validated by payment of a penalty under the proviso of that section whereas a similar instrument bearing a stamp and, therefore, admissible and enforceable to a limited extent could in no case be fully enforced even by paying the panalty, or admitted in evidence for the purpose of proving the full extent of the contract entered into between the parties. The argument that the instrument in the present case is duly stamped within the meaning of section 35 and, therefore, not entitled to the benefit of the proviso appears to me to be fallacious. One must look at the existing circumstances to see whether the stamp is sufficient. It is true that, as long as the royalty does not exceed the estimated amount upon which the stamp is computed, no objection can be taken to the instrumnet on the ground of deficiency in the stamp, but once the estimate is exceeded the instrument becomes insufficiently stamped for the only purpose for which it can be put in evidence, that is for the purpose of proving and enforcing the terms of the bargain between the parties. It becomes just as much unduly stamped in the altered circumstances as if the lease had been one for a fixed rent written on a stamp inadequate for the expressed amount. I am of opinion that the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge was right and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

MULLICK, J.—I agree that the Subordinate Judge was right in applying section 35 to the lease in question. In that section the words "no instrumsnt chargeable with duty shall be admitted in evidence for any purpose" mean "shall be admitted in evidence for any purpose for which a stamp is necessary", and so it has been held that, although a document is inadmissible for the purpose of proving a claim, it may be admissible for a collateral purpose, that is a purpose foreign and not subordinate to the purpose for which the document was executed. Unlike the Evidence Act the Stamp Act does not base its rules on theories of relevancy or of public policy. It is purely fiscal and insists that certain documents shall pay a contribution to the state according to the purpose for which they were executed. In regard to certain documents which create a right to money it prescribes that unless the stamp is proportionate to the valuation of the claim the document shall be inadmissible in evidence and where the intention of the parties is that the valuation shall be unlimited it enacts by section 26 that the claimant will be entitled to realise a sum proportionate to the stamp-fee paid, subject to certain exceptions in the case of royalties on coal. It follows that, wherever the claim exceeds the amount proportionate to the stamp, the document is not duly stamped for the purpose for which it was executed.

In regard to the lease under consideration, the object of the parties was clearly to create an unlimited liability and, therefore, the ad valorem fee of Rs. 20 was not the proper fee. Section 35 of the Act, therefore, was rightly called in aid by the Subordirate Judge and I agree that the appeal must fail.

RAM SAROOP v. DALPAT RAI.

ALLAHABAD HIGH COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 1284 OF 1917.

Present:—Mr. Justice Sulaiman and Mr. Justice Gokul Prasad.

RAM SAROOP—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

DALPAT RAI AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, r. 93—Execution of decree—Sale set aside—Auction-purchaser, remedy of—Suit to recover purchase-money, whether maintainable.

There is no principle of equity or law according to which an auction-purchaser is entitled to a refund of the purchase-money, in case it is discovered later on that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest. The remedy provided by Order XXI, rule 93 of the Civil Procedure Code is confined to an order for re-payment under the circumstances mentioned in the rule. A suit for refund of the purchase-money is not maintainable. [p. 112, col. 1.]

Second appeal from a decree of the District Judge, Budaun.

Mr. Tek Bahadur Sapru, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Mr. Lakshmi Narain (with him Babu Narain Prasad Asthana), for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

SULAIMAN, J.—This is a plaintiff's appeal arising out of a suit brought by an auction-purchaser for recovery of the purchase-money paid by him, and taken away by the decree-holder, as well as for the surplus sale proceeds still in deposit in Court, on the ground that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest in the property sold at all. It appears that Dalpat Rai and Basant Rai, who are now represented by defendants Nos. 2 to 6, held a simple money-decree against one Durga Prasad for a sum of Rs. 1,206 and odd. In execution of that decree certain property was attached as belonging to the judgment-debtor and put up for sale and purchased by the present plaintiff-appellant The appellant paid the purchase-money and the sale was confirmed on the 27th of July 1911. One Jawahir Lal brought a suit for a declaration of his own title and for setting aside the sale against the decree holders, the judgment debtor and the auction-purchaser. This suit was decreed on the 1st of December 1911. The decree-holders took out part of the sale-proceeds, deposited in Court in satisfaction of their decree, leaving a sum of Rs. 617-12 8 as the surplus sale proceeds. In 1917, the present suit was filed for recovery of the purchase-money on the ground that the judgment debtor had no saleable interest in the property at all. The Court of first instance decreed the suit with respect to the amount which was still in deposit in Court, but dismissed it as against the decree-holders. The plaintiff appealed to the Court of the District Judge and the defendants filed cross objections. The learned Judge affirmed the decree of the Court of first instance, holding that the suit was not maintainable. The defendants have submitted to the decree. The plaintiff has come up to this Court in second appeal. On his behalf it is contended that he is, in equity, entitled to recover the amount paid by him when he is not able to retain the property, and that legally there is no bar to such a claim.

As the appeal raises an important question of law it is necessary to consider it at some length. Under section 258 of Act VIII of 1859 it was provided that,—"whenever a sale of immoveable property is set aside, the purchaser shall be entitled to receive back his purchase-money, with or without interest, in such manner as it may appear proper to the Court to direct in each instance." It is clear that, although under that Code, there was an express provision entitling the auction-purchaser to receive back his purchase-money in case the sale was set aside, there was no such provision in the case where the sale had not been set aside, even though it were found that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest in the property at all. Again, the Code did not expressly specify the manner in which the right to recover this money could be enforced. It was open to the Court to direct the auction-purchaser to recover his money by an application in that Court or by a separate regular suit. The rulings under this Code seem to have recognised, as an established principle of law, that a purchaser at a sale in execution of a decree could not recover his purchase money if it turned out that the judgment debtor had no saleable interest in the property put up for sale, and that section 258 solely applied to those cases in which the sale had been set aside for irregularity in publishing and conducting it; vide, Sowdamini Chowdhrain v. Krishna Kishore

Poddar (1), (where the sale had taken place even prior to the Act) Hira Lal v. Karimunnissa (2), and Ram Narain Singh v. Maltab Bibi (3). While, therefore, the Code of 1859 was in force, the Courts did not recognise any independent rule of equity, justice or good conscience under which an auction-purchaser could recover his purchase-money if it turned out that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest at all. The case of Dorab Ally Khan v. Abdool Azeez (4) requires special consideration, because the learned Advocate for the appellant places great reliance on it and has urged that the full significance of this case has not been appreciated in subsequent rulings. His contention is, that it has not been clearly borne in mind that the Privy Council did ultimately remand the case for the trial of the question whether the auction purchaser's representative had shown a case which, if proved, would entitle him to recover back the purchase money, "as money had and received to his use as upon a total failure of consideration." In that case, in execution of a simple money-decree, certain property belonging to a judgment-debtor, situated in Oudh, had been seized by the Calcutta Sheriff at the instance of the decree-holder and put up for sale and sold. Subsequently, the judgment debtor, in some proceedings in the Oudh Courts, obtained a decree declaring that the sale was null and void. On this the auction-purchaser's representative brought a suit against the decree-holder for the recovery of the purchase-money paid by him. The question in that case was not, whether the auction-purchaser was entitled to receive back his purchase-money if it was found that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest in the property at all, but the question was, whether he was entitled to recover the money if it was found that the Sheriff had no jurisdiction to sell the property although the property did in fact belong to the judgment-debtor. In Dorab Ally Khan v. Abdool Azeez (4) the question for consideration is stated to be as follows: "The question then arises, can the purchaser, at a sale by the Sheriff under a writ of fi. fa, upon being evicted by the execution-debtor, recover the purchase-money, which he has paid, from the execution-creditor if it should turn out that the Sheriff had no authority to execute the writ at the place where the property was situate." The High Court of Calcutta [vide Dorab Ally Khan v. Khajah Moheeooddeen (5)], had assumed that if the defendant was to be treated as a principal in the transaction the case was governed by the ordinary rules relating to vendors and purchasers upon voluntary sales, and had applied the rule that a purchaser, who, after the execution of the conveyance, is evicted by a title to which the covenants in the conveyance do not extend, cannot recover the purchase-money from his vendors. Their Lordships of the Privy Council held that the rule, which governed sales by private contracts, was not properly applicable to sales by the Sheriff. At the same time, on page 126, their Lordships remarked, "Now it is, of course, perfectly clear that when the property has been so sold under a regular execution, and the purchaser is afterwards evicted under a title paramount to that of the judgment-debtor, he has no remedy against either the Sheriff or the judgment-creditor. This, however, is because the Sheriff is authorised by the writ to seize the property of the execution-debtor which lies within his territorial jurisdiction and to pass the debtor's title to it without warranting that title to be good. The Sheriff, however, if he acts ultra vires cannot invoke the protection which the law gives to him when acting within his jurisdiction." That the decision of that case turned on the absence of jurisdiction in the Sheriff to sell the property is further borne out by the remarks on page 127 that, "Their Lordships think that, upon a similar principle, the Sheriff may be held to undertake by his conduct that he has seized and put up for sale the property sold in the exercise of his jurisdiction, although when he has jurisdiction he does not in any way warrant that the judgment-debtor had a good title to it, or guarantee that the purchaser shall not be turned out of possession by some person other than the judgment-debtor. In the present case, the subject-matter of the sale was the estate of the execution-debtor, so that, if the Sheriff had had jurisdiction, his conveyance would have passed the title. It was solely because he was acting beyond his territorial jurisdiction that the sale became inoperative and wholly ineffectual." As the case had not been approached by the Courts below from the correct point of view their Lordships felt that the action could not be determined without further investigation into the facts. It is true that, in the concluding portion of the judgment, their Lordships say, "They only decide that the plaintiff has not wholly failed to disclose a good cause of action on the face of the record;" but their Lordships also say that they, "of course, offer no opinion whether the plaintiff will ultimately succeed in establishing his right to any relief." The distinguishing feature of that case is that there, at the instance of the decree holder, the Sheriff had tried to sell property situated outside his jurisdiction, and in this he was "in the position of an ordinary person who has sold that which he had no title to sell." In my opinion, this case is no authority for the proposition that, independently of any provision of the Code, an auction purchaser has a right to recover his purchase-money by a regular suit when it is found that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest at all, though the property is situated within the jurisdiction of the execution Court.

Act X of 1877, and the consolidating Act XIV of 1882, introduced material alterations in the Code. Section 315 of Act XIV of 1882 provided two things,—

(1) It gave the purchaser a right to receive back his purchase-money from any person to whom the purchase-money had been paid, in case the sale was set aside under section 312 or 313; and

(2) It also gave him such right when, although the sale was not set aside, it was found that the judgment debtor had no saleable interest in the property which purported to be sold and the purchaser was, for that reason, deprived of it. The section then went on to provide that the re-payment of the said purchase-money might be enforced against the person to whom it had been paid under the rules provided by the Code for the execution of a decree for money.

A controversy naturally arose as to whether the auction-purchaser's remedy was limited to an application in the execution department, or whether he could maintain a separate suit. This controversy was set at rest by a decision of the Full Bench of this Court, reported as Munna Singh v. Gajadhar Singh (6), where it was clearly laid down that there was no bar to a separate suit. The learned Advocate for the appellant has strongly contended that this Full Bench case recognises a rule of equity, independently of the provisions of any Code, that a separate suit is maintainable. In my opinion, the judgments of all the Judges who decided that case proceeded on the assumption that a right to recover the purchase-money was given to the auction-purchaser by section 315 of the Code, and I do not find any passage which would support the contention that they decided that there was a right to recover the money independently of the provisions of that section. On the other hand, the judgment of Stuart, C. J., on page 582, makes it quite clear that the case was held to be governed by the third clause of section 315. That case has, of course, been followed by this Court in subsequent cases,—vide, Kishun Lal v. Muhammad Safdar Ali Khan (7), Shanto Chandar Mukerji v. Nain Sukh (8) and Sidheswari Prasad Narain Singh v. Goshain Mayanand (9), in which it was clearly held that, outside the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, an auction-purchaser had no right to recover back his purchase-money merely by showing that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest.

The provisions of Act V of 1908 differ from those of Act XIV of 1882. In the first place, the provision in section 315 to the effect that, when it is found that the judgment debtor has no saleable interest in the property which is purported to be sold, and the purchaser is for that reason deprived of it, the purchaser shall be entitled to receive back his purchase-money, does not find a place in Order XXI, rule 93; and, in the next place, the expression "shall be entitled to receive back his purchase-money" has been replaced by the words "shall be entitled to an order for re-payment of his purchase-money." In my opinior, these are material alterations which cannot be ignored. If no right existed independently of the provisions of section 315 of the Code of 1882, entitling an auction-purchaser to receive back his purchase-money by a regular suit in case the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest, then it is clear that no such right is recognised by Order XXI, rule 93; the only remedy provided by that rule is for the auction-purchaser to apply for an order for re-payment of the purchase-money in case the sale has been set aside by the Court. In my opinion, section 315 of the old Code had given a substantive right to an auction-purchaser to bring a separate suit. That right has not been granted by Order XXI, rule 93. As had been held in the cases decided before Act XIV of 1882 came into force, there was no independent right under which an auction-purchaser could receive back the purchase money on the ground that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest in the property, apart from the express provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure. There is no such provision in the present Code; on the other hand, Order XXI, rule 92 (3) rather shows that no suit to set aside an order confirming a sale can be brought by any person against whom such order is made. The prohibition against a regular suit contained in the last clause of section 312 of Act XIV of 1882 was very limited in scope. The section provided that "no suit to set aside, on the ground of such irregularity, an order passed under this section shall be brought by the party against whom such order has been made." Whereas the third clause of Order XXI, rule 92 of the present Code is very general in its terms, and the expression "on the ground of such irregularity" is not to be found there. This seems to indicate that no separate suit challenging the order of confirmation can be brought on any ground whatsoever.

There is, as has already been observed, a clear distinction between auction sales and private sales. In the case of a private sale which, is the result of a private contract between the parties concerned, there is either an express or implied warranty of title. If it subsequently turns out that the property transferred did not belong to the vendor, the vendee is in equity and justice entitled to get back his sale consideration. In an auction sale, however, which takes place against the will of the judgment-debtor, there could possibly be no warranty of title on behalf of the judgment debtor. Nor does the decree holder, through the sale officer, give any guarantee; he merely puts up for sale the rights and interest which the judgment-debtor might possess in the property. The auction-purchaser who purchases the property, therefore, takes a risk, and if it turns out that the judgment-debtor really has no interest in the property sought to be sold, it is the misfortune of the auction-purchaser. Unless there be a special remedy provided for compensation, I fail to discover any rule of equity which would entitle him to get back his money. I can conceive of many difficulties which might arise if such a right is recognised independently of any express provision of law. It might be after a very long period that it is discovered that the judgment-debtor has no saleable interest at all. The sale-proceeds might be distributed among a number of decree-holders and it might be very hard on the decree-holders to be called upon to refund the amount after several years. Again, if there be a rule of equity under which an auction purchaser can recover his purchase-money in case it is found that the judgment debtor had no saleable interest at all, why should he not also recover a proportionate amount when he has a smaller interest than what purported to be sold. In Mohideen Ibrahim v. Mahamed Meera Levvai (10) Napier, J., came to the conclusion that, under the new Code of Civil Procedure, there was no provision entitling an auction purchaser to receive back his purchase money in a regular suit, though it is true that Ayling, J., was a little doubtful on the point and considered it unnecessary to express an opinion on it. In the case of Ram Kumar Shaha v. Ram Gour Shaha (11) the Calcutta High Court was of the same opinion and pointed out that, before the passing of Act XIV of 1882, no such right was recognised, as is manifest from the decision in Dorab Ally Khan v. Abdool Azeez (4) and that it was only under the provisions of section 315 of Act XIV of 1882 that a right to bring a suit was recognised.

In Muhammad Najib Ullah v. Jai Narain (12) a Division Bench of this Court seems to have doubted the soundness of the decision in Munna Singh v. Gajadhar Singh (6), and felt inclined to refer the point to a Full Bench. But, before doing so, they thought it desirable to refer an issue as to the interest of the judgment debtor at the time of the sale. In Nannu Lal v. Bhagwan Das (13) the point raised in this appeal was clearly decided against the appellant. That case is on all fours with the present case and I am in perfect accord with the reasoning of the learned Chief Justice who delivered the judgment in that case. The provisions of Act V of 1908 do not recognise the right of an auction-purchaser to maintain a suit for the recovery of the purchase money or to get the sale set aside. His right is limited to an application for an order for re-payment of the purchase money after the sale has been set aside. In my opinion, therefore, the finding of the learned District Judge that the suit was not maintainable is correct.

On behalf of the respondent it was further urged that, on the face of it, the suit was barred by limitation because the decree declaring the sale to have been null and void was passed on the 1st of December 1911 and the suit was brought more than three years after it. It is contended that, either Article 97 or Article 62 of the Limitation Act applies to this case, and the suit is barred by the three years' rule. There may be difficulty in holding that either Article 97 or Article 62 applies. If neither of these articles applies then the general Article 120 would apply. However, in view of my opinion as to the non-maintainability of the suit, I consider it quite unnecessary to decide this point. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

GOKUL PRASAD, J.—I agree in the conclusion arrived at by my learned colleague. As the point raised is, however, of some importance I would like to add a few observations.

The question which arises in this case, put shortly, comes to this. In a case where it is found that the property sold by auction in execution of a decree does not belong to a judgment debtor, is it open to an auction-purchaser to bring a suit, independently of the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code, to enforce a claim for refund of the purchase-money on the ground, either of failure of consideration, or of a rule of equity that where a party has parted with a sum of money and has not had the full benefit of it, the person who has had the benefit of that money is bound to refund it? The question is not an easy one to answer, and the difficulty has been made still greater by the fact that, in order to see that an auction-purchaser is not prejudiced, there have been attempts by the Legislature to safeguard his rights to a certain extent. Most of the cases cited at the Bar have dealt with the special provisions of the Codes which governed the auction purchases under consideration. But the question really which has to be decided in the present suit is, it being admitted or being beyond dispute that the present Code of Civil Procedure recognises no such general right except to the extent to which it is limited under Order XXI, rule 93 of the Civil Procedure Code, which admittedly does not apply to the present case, does a suit lie independently of those provisions? In order to understand the position clearly it will be necessary to trace to some extent the history of the various pieces of legislation relating to this subject. The first in point of time which, so far as India is concerned, dealt with this subject is Regulation VII of 1825. The 7th clause of the 3rd section of that Regulation provided,—"In all cases of public sale of property under this Regulation it shall be clearly explained to the bidders at the sale, that nothing is guaranteed to them in the land or other property sold, beyond the rights and interests therein of the individuals answerable for the amount of the decree, or other process in execution of which the sale is made." Or, in other words, the only guarantee which attended the auction-sales was a guarantee that the judgment-debtor, or those who claim through him, would not recover back the property. This Regulation was apparently founded on the rule of English law that there is no warranty of title in auction sales except in so far that the Court's jurisdiction to sell the property is assured; See Dorab Ally Khan v. Abdool Azeez (4). There is no guarantee "that the judgment-debtor had a good title to the property or a guarantee that the purchaser shall not be turned out of possession by some person other than the judgment debtor." This was the rule enforced before the passing of Act VIII of 1859. The case of Sowdamini Chowdhrain v. Krishna Kishore Poddar (1), decided by a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court, very well expresses the principle underlying such sales. The sale in that case took place in the year 1854, and the Judges there were considering the question as to whether the auction purchaser could have any right to a refund of the purchase-money in case it was subsequently discovered that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest in the property. The judgment was delivered by Peacock, C. J., and, after quoting the well-known passage from Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers which has also been referred to in the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of Dorab Ally Khan v. Abdool Azeez (4), the learned Judge proceeded to observe as follows :—

"There is a great distinction between the case of a purchaser being evicted by title paramount, and that of the conveyance by the vendors being set aside. In the one case the owner of the land recovers notwithstanding the conveyance, because it was a conveyance of his land by a person who had no right to convey it; in the other case, where a sale has been set aside, the purchaser usually has a right to recover back his purchase-money, because it would be inequitable that the vendor should retain the purchase-money when there are grounds for setting aside the sale by which the contract is put an end to. But a Court of Equity does not set aside a conveyance simply because the conveying party had no title to the property. There must be something more, such as fraud or the like, to induce the Court to interfere in that manner. A purchaser at a sale in execution knows that all that he purchases is the right and title of the judgment-debtor. He knows that no one guarantees to him that the judgment-debtor has a good title, and he purchases the property with his eyes open and he regulates the price which he bids for the land with reference to the circumstances under which he is purchasing, and the risk he runs." In the absence of any express legislation, e. g., Acts of 1859, 1877 and 1882, this principle would seem to regulate the right of an auction-purchaser so far as his right to a refund of the purchase-money is concerned. The oldest case on the subject, which I have been able to discover, is a Full Bench decision of the Calcutta Sudder Court, Dost Mahomed Khan v. Prosunnonath Roy (14). The decision is not reported in full but the principle laid down is that, "a purchaser at a sale in satisfaction of a decree, of a party's rights and interests, is not entitled to the recovery of his purchase-money, on the rights and interests sold turning out to be without title." Another case is Baboo Rughoonath Suhay v. Brijbeharee Lal (15). In that case the auction sale was set aside in a regular suit and their Lordships came to the same conclusion. It was, perhaps, to remove the hardships thus entailed upon an auction-purchaser that section 258 of Act VIII of 1859 was enacted.

Questions arose about the interpretation of this section and, in some of them, it was held that the right given under this section was an absolute right, see Greesh Chunder Pottar v. Lookhooda Moyee Dabee (16) and Brojendur Roy Chowdhry v. Jugurnath Roy (17).

Later on, when Act X of 1877 was passed, it was enacted in section 315 that, "when it is found that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest in the property which purported to be sold, and the purchaser is, for that reason, deprived of it, the purchaser shall be entitled to receive back his purchase-money (with or without interest as the Court may direct) from any person to whom the purchase-money has been paid, etc." This was the first occasion on which the right of an auction-purchaser to a refund of the purchase-money, simply on the ground of discovery that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest in the property, was recognised. The same was the effect of the amending and consolidating enactment of Act XIV of 1882. Most of the cases which have been cited to us were cases in which the existence of this right to a refund was admitted, but the only question was whether the remedy lay by certain proceedings by way of an application, or there was also a remedy by a separate suit. This Court consistently held that the remedy provided by section 258 of Act VIII of 1859 or section 315 of Acts of 1877 and 1882 was only permissive; or, in other words, it was not the only remedy open to an auction-purchaser but he could enforce the right given to him by the above sections by a separate suit also. It was held by this High Court that the section was only permissive and that an auction-purchaser had a right of suit. None of the older cases touched, or could touch, upon the point now raised before us, namely, whether, independently of the enactment in the Civil Procedure Code, there was any right of suit; because in all those cases the attention of the Courts was directed to the special provisions of the enactment then under consideration. The only cases in which these principles have been touched upon are the following Sheikh Mahomed Basirullah v. Sheikh Abdulla (18), Shanto Chandar Mukerji v. Nain Sukh (8), Sidheswari Prasad Narain Singh v. Goshain Mayanand (9) and Dorab Ally Khan v. Abdool Azeez (4) The present Code of Civil Procedure, Act V of 1908, has departed from the enactment of 1877 and 1882 in this respect, that in this Act the provision regarding the right of an auction-purchaser to a refund of his purchase-money on the ground that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest in it, has been omitted Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru, on behalf of the appellant, has strongly relied upon the ruling in Munna Singh v. Gajadhar Singh (6), and has contended that the said case supports his contention to the full. He has argued that the case has laid down in clear and unambiguous language that the auction-purshaser had a right of suit where it was discovered subsequently that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest in the property. But, we must bear in mind, that, all through that case it was not contested that such a right did exist in the auction-purchaser. The whole contest was centred round the question whether the remedy of the auction-purchaser was by a separate suit or by way of proceedings in execution. That case, therefore, does not support the contention so well put forward and strenuously urged. He has tried to distinguish the case in Dorab Ali Khan v. Abdool Azeez (4) on the ground that, although their Lordships in one part of the judgment held that there was no warranty of title in auction sales, and, therefore, an auction purchaser had no right to a refund of the purchase-money, still, further on, about the close of the judgment, they remand the case for trial on the merits. But, we must bear in mind, that, the circumstances of that case were somewhat peculiar. The sale of certain property outside his jurisdiction was made by the Sheriff. There was a further question if the auction-purchaser knew that the Sheriff was acting ultra vires in selling property beyond the local limits of his own jurisdiction, and, thirdly, there was a question as to the amount realised and appropriated by the auction-purchaser which might have to be set-off against the purchase-money, in case the Court came to the conclusion that he was entitled to the latter. Their Lordships of the Privy Council considered, first of all, the position of sales at auction conducted by the Sheriff who had jurisdiction to sell the property, and came to the conclusion that, if that had been the case, there would have been no question that the auction-purchaser had no right to a refund of the purchase-money, but they went on to held that, as the Sheriff had acted beyond his jurisdiction, therefore, the following considerations might prevail. First, whether the auction-purchaser purchased the property with full knowledge that he was purchasing something which the Sheriff had no right to sell. If this fact was found against the auction-purchaser, perhaps, the suit might fail, but, none-the-less, it was a fact which was to be found one way or the other, and in case it turned out that the auction-purchaser had no intimation of the defect in the proceedings taken by the Sheriff, the further question that might arise would be as to the amount which he would be entitled to get the refund of; and it was only for the consideration of these latter points that the case was sent back to the High Court, so that these last observations did in no way detract from the meaning of the previous pronouncement. That this is the meaning of their Lordships of the Privy Council is also evident from the views taken by the various High Courts in India in a large number of cases in which this case, as the leading case on the subject, has very often been discussed and referred to. As an example, we might mention the case of Shanto Chandar Mukerji v. Nain Sukh (8) decided by this Court. We have also to bear in mind the fact that, in cases where it has been found that the judgment-debtor had only a smaller interest in the property sold, compared to what was purported to be sold, the Courts had never allowed the auction-purchaser a proportionate refund, which they would have done if there had been some principle of equity, justice and good conscience which enabled the auction purchaser to claim a refund. Apart altogether from the provisions of the Codes of Civil Procedure of 1877 and 1882, which would have entitled the auction purchaser to a refund of the full amount of the purchase-money, in case it was found that the judgment-debtor had no title whatever, there could have been no warrant for holding that, if the interest which the judgment-debtor really had in the property was smaller than what was sold, a proportionate reduction in the purchase-money should not have been refunded to the auction-purchaser. There is, thus, no doubt whatever that there is no principle of equity or law according to which an auction-purchaser is entitled to a refund of the purchase-money, in case it is discovered later on that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest. The whole of the law on this subject to be found in the reported cases in which such a right has been recognised, is on the express wordings of the various sections of the different enactments. I am, therefore, of opinion that the case reported in Nannu Lal v. Bhagwan Dass (13) was rightly decided, and that, having regard to the provisions of the present Code of Civil Procedure, a suit for refund does not lie except in a case where a sale is set aside under the provisions of Order XXI, rule 92.

I would, therefore, agree with the order proposed.

BY THE COURT.—The order of the Court is that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

DAULAT AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

C. P. Tenancy Act (XI of 1898), s. 41 (7)—Occupancy tenant—Alienation of part of holding—Landlord, whether can re-enter.

An alienation by an absolute occupancy tenant of a part of his holding without the consent of the landlord does not entitle the malguzar to sue for ejectment of the transferee as a trespasser and to re-enter on the ground that the transfer is void as against him under section 41 (7) of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act. [p. 113, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Nagpur, dated the 22nd February 1919, in Civil Appeal No. 105 of 1918.

Mr. S. K. Barlingay, for the Appellant.

Messrs. M. B. Niyogi and A. P. Sathaye, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—All the facts that require consideration in this appeal can be stated in a few words. In 1902 an absolute occupancy tenant mortgaged a quarter share in his holding of about sixteen acres without the consent of his landlord. The rent of the holding was Rs. 28 4 0. The mortgagee obtained a decree for foreclosure and in 1916, in execution of that decree, a plot of four acres was demarcated from the holding and the mortgagee was put in possession. The plot is recorded in the jamabandi of 1916-17 (immediately after the Settlement) as his separate occupancy holding on a rent of Rs. 9. The malguzar in this suit claims to eject the transferee as a trespasser and to re-enter, on the ground that the transfer is void as against him under section 41 (7) of the Tenancy Act of 1898.

My learned brother Macnair, who decided the appeal as District Judge, adopted the reasoning in an unreported judgment of Sir Henry Drake-Brockman, J. C., in Lachman v. Gangapuri (1) and also the ruling of the Calcutta High Court in Icharan Singh v. Nilmoney Balidar (2) which is a case from the Sambalpur District governed by the Central Provinces Tenancy Act. Lachman v. Gangapuri (1) refers to the sale of a defined and demarcated half of his absolute occupancy holding of 24 acres by one Balaji without the landlord's consent, and the learned Judicial Commissioner said:—"In second appeal the only point pressed is that the transfer of 12 acres gave the landlords no right of entry. On the other side the contention is that Lachman, being a mere trespasser, should be ejected, the interest of Balaji being adequately protected by section 41 (8) of the Tenancy Act, 1898, which will enable him to recover the land, if he chooses to do so. I think the case should be decided with reference to the principles that, in order to maintain an action of ejectment, a plaintiff must be entitled to immediate entry and possession and that, before a landlord can eject his tenant's transferee, he must prove abandonment by the tenant; see Bhola v. Fathu (3). Balaji's holding is one and indivisible; it is not alleged that he has refused to pay the rent of the whole; and he cannot be said to have abandoned the holding while still in possession of part. In Bansi Das v. Jagdip Narain (4) the facts were similar to those now under consideration, in that, part of a holding was transferred and the claim was for khas possession of the transferred part only. Beverley and Trevellyan, JJ., held that, whether or not the entire holding was transferable, alienation of part would not work a forfeiture. Sheik Gozaffur Hossein v. Dablish (5) was a case where part of a non-transferable holding was transferred, and the same two Judges declined to allow the landlord to recover the entire holding; but Durga Prosad Sen v. Doula Gazee (6) is precisely in point. I may mention here that the judgments of Rampini, J., and Petheram, C. J., and Macpherson, J., referred to at page 161 of the case last cited, will be found reproduced on page CLV of 2 Calcutta Weekly Notes [Durga Charan Roy v. Pandab Nath (7).] The landlord's interests are safeguarded by recognising their right to sue the original tenant, Balaji, for the rent of the entire holding if he fails to pay, section 43 of the Tenancy Act will enable them to sell the holding, and the sale could no more be opposed by Lachman than it could be by one who had taken the whole under an invalid conveyance. Nor can the provisions of section 42 of the Act be overlooked; they protect an absolute occupancy tenant from ejectment by his landlord as such "for any cause."

The same interpretation was put on the similar words used in section 43 of the Tenancy Act of 1883 in Icharan Singh v. Nilmoney Balidar (2) though the case of an occupancy tenant may possibly now be different in this respect from that of an absolute occupancy tenant through the changes introduced by the Acts of 1898 and 1917. In the present case it cannot be said that the tenant has abandoned even that part of his holding now in the possession of his mortgagee until he has refused to pay rent for it. If he does refuse, the landlord must sue him for the rent and can sell the whole of the holding if necessary in execution of the decree. It is suggested that this opens a wide door to fraud because an absolute occupancy tenant can, in this view, transfer practically the whole of his holding without his landlord's consent retaining only a very small portion, and the landlord would have no remedy against the transferee so long as the latter paid his rent through the original tenant, a matter in which the tenant would doubtless be quite willing to oblige him. This may possibly occur, but it must be remembered

ALLAHABAD HIGH COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 1293 OF 1917.

June 17, 1920.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLI, r. 33—Decree against several defendants—Appeal by some defendants—Appellate Court, power of, to modify decree in favour of non-appealing defendant.

A decree was made partly against A. and partly against B. A alone appealed and did not make B. a party to the appeal. The Appellate Court found that the whole claim of the plaintiff should have been decreed as against A alone:

Held, that the Appellate Court had power, under Order XLI, rule 33, of the Civil Procedure Code, to modify the trial Court's decree by dismissing the plaintiff's suit as against B and decreeing the whole of it as against A. [p. 115, cols. 1 & 2.]

Second appeal from a decree of the First Additional Judge, Aligarh, modifying that of the Assistant Collector, First Class.

Mr. Narain Prasad Asthana, for the Appellants.

Messrs. Girdharilal Agarwala and Iqbal Ahmad, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—These two connected appeals are appeals by the defendants in suits for profits under section 165 of the Tenancy Act against their co-sharers. It is admitted that the plaintiffs are entitled to a 1/6th share of the total profits.

Second Appeal No. 1296 arises out of a suit which was brought on the 21st of July 1916. The suit was decreed partly against Kazim Ali Beg and partly against Musammats Jawahar Bano and Mumtaz Bano. Musammats Jawahar Bano and Mumtaz Bano appealed to the District Judge without making Kazim Ali Beg a party to the appeal. Kazim Ali did not appeal from the decree against him. No appeal or cross-objection was filed by the plaintiffs against Musammats Jawahar Bano and Mumtaz Bano.

Second Appeal No. 1293 arises out of Suit No. 12 of 1915 for profits by the same plaintiffs against the same set of defendants but for different years. In this case, also, a decree was passed against these two sets of defendants, but both of them appealed to the District Judge. After various remands, these three appeals were tried together by the District Judge and have been disposed of by one judgment, which, unfortunately, has caused some confusion. In the opinion of the District Judge, Kazim Ali was not liable for any share of the profits to the plaintiffs at all. On the other hand, he has found that Jawahar Bano and Mumtaz Bano had realised more than their share of the profits and were alone responsible to the plaintiffs. The result of his finding was this, that he allowed Kazim Ali's appeal in the second suit and exempted him altogether from all liability. He dismissed Jawahar Bano's and Mumtaz Bano's appeal, but, at the same time, he has modified the decree of the first Court in both these suits and decreed the plaintiffs' claim for the amounts found due by the first Court as against Jawahar Bano and Mumtaz Bano. Only two appeals have been filed in this Court. No appeal has been filed by the defendants, Jawahar Bano and Mumtaz Bano, from the decree allowing the appeal of Kazim Ali against them. In our opinion, when the District Judge was satisfied that it was Jawahar Bano and Mumtaz Bano alone who were liable to pay the plaintiffs' share of the profits, he had jurisdiction to modify the decree of the first Court and decree the plaintiffs' claim as against these two defendants only. It is true that Kazim Ali was not formally made a party in the appeal which had arisen out of the first suit. But, as the modification of the decree was to be in favour of Kazim Ali himself, who had been a party to the original suit, the defect of his not having been formally brought on the record in that appeal is not very material.

SAHEB BAKHSH SINGH v. MOHAMMAD ALI.

Great reliance has been placed by the learned Vakil for the appellants on the Full Bench case of Rangamlal v. Jhandu (1). In that case, in a suit brought by a Zemindar against a tenant for rent, the Court of first instance had decreed the claim for a much smaller amount than that claimed by the plaintiff. The plaintiff submitted to the decree and never appealed from it. The defendant-tenant appealed to the District Judge, challenging the decree. After a remand the District Judge was of opinion that the defendant was, in reality, liable to pay more to the plaintiff, and he, while dismissing the defendant's appeal, modified the decree of the first Court and granted the plaintiff a decree for a greater amount. The Full Bench in that case held that, although the words of Order XLI, rule 33, were very wide and the Judge, strictly speaking, had jurisdiction to pass the decree which he had made, still there was not a proper exercise of jurisdiction by him in that case. It was pointed out that, in a case where there is no sufficient reason for a respondent neglecting either to appeal or to file objections, the Court will hesitate before allowing him to object at the hearing of the appeal. The case before us, however, is clearly distinguishable. In the present case, if we simply allowed the defendants' appeal and dismissed the plaintiffs' suit as against them, it would be doing a great injustice to the plaintiffs, because they would be deprived of the amount to which they have been found entitled. The plaintiffs must have their decree for profits, and the only question for consideration before the District Judge was whether that decree should be against one set of defendants or against another set of defendants. When the Judge was of opinion that Kazim Ali, defendant, was really not liable to the plaintiffs for their profits, he exercised his jurisdiction very properly in directing that the defendants, Jawahar Bano and Mumtaz Bano, should be made liable for the whole amount. In Second Appeal No. 1293, which arises out of the second suit, Kazim Ali was actually a respondent in the appeals before the District Judge and no defect of non-joinder can be urged in that case.

We think that the learned District Judge has acted within his jurisdiction in passing the decree which he has passed and we find no grounds for holding that his exercise of jurisdiction, as conferred on him by Order XLI, rule 33, has in any way been improper. Substantial justice has been done in this case. These appeals are without force and are hereby dismissed with costs.

OUDH JUDICIAL COMMISSIONER'S COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 91 OF 1919.

April 21, 1920.

SAHEB BAKHSH SINGH—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

THE HON'BLE SIR Raja MOHAMMAD ALI MOHAMMAD KHAN—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Pleadings—Party, whether can succeed on case not set up—Mortgage—Redemption, suit for—Plea that mortgage was a sham, effect of—Court, whether can hold that transaction amounted to sale—Clog on equity of redemption—Interest, high rate of—Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 92—Plea that document is fictitious—Evidence, admissibility of.

Where in a suit for redemption the case set up by the defendant is that the transaction was a sham which was not intended to have any legal effect, but was, for the purpose of defeating a threatened claim to pre-emption, drawn up in order to mask a transaction of sale already completed, a finding that the transaction was intended to take effect as a sale cannot be sustained, as such finding, in effect, sets up a case that was not advanced by the defendant. [p. 120, cols. 1 & 2.]

It is not open to a plaintiff in a redemption suit to put forward a case of clog merely upon the ground that a high rate of interest has been stipulated for in the mortgage-deed, nor, in the absence of any proof of undue influence or unfair dealing in the stipulation for interest, would the plaintiff be entitled to any relief on this head. [p. 121, col. 2.]

In a redemption suit the defendant is entitled to raise the plea that the deed of mortgage in suit is a fictitious document intended to cover a previously completed transaction of sale between the parties, and, under the first proviso to section 92 of the Evidence Act, to prove any facts which would invalidate the deed. [p. 119, cols. 1 & 2.]

SAHEB BAKHSH SINGH v. MOHAMMAD ALI.

Appeal from the decree of the second Additional District Judge, Lucknow, dated the 10th January 1919, confirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Bara Banki, dated the 19th September 1917.

Babu Bisheshwar Nath Srivastava, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Syed Wazir Hasan, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This second appeal has arisen out of a suit for redemption which has been dismissed in both the Courts below. The suit was brought by one Saheb Bakhsh Singh, who is the legal representative of one Mahipat Singh, and the mortgage which is in suit is said to have been executed by Mahipat Singh on the 16th of June 1869 in favour of the then taluqdar of Mahmudabad who is represented now by the present defendant respondent.

This document purports to mortgage two 4-anna shares in two villages named Sadrapur and Nankuin. The mortgage-money was Rs. 5,000 and the period of mortgage is thirty years. The mortgagee was to remain in possession and to appropriate the profits in satisfaction of a part of the interest. Over and above the profits, the mortgagee was to be entitled to interest at the rate of 24 per cent. per annum on the principal sum at the time of redemption. It is also provided by the deed that there was to be no accounting between the parties at the time the redemption is sought.

The defence set up in this case was that, there was no relation of mortgagor and mortgagee between the parties and that the plaintiff was not entitled to a decree for redemption. It was admitted that the deed upon which the plaintiff relied for the purpose of this suit had been executed and that a sum of Rs. 5,000 had changed hands at the time of the execution, but it was alleged that this document was really not a deed of mortgage at all but that it had been executed as a mask to cover a transaction of sale which had already been concluded between the parties. It was stated that the purpose of executing the mortgage was to forestall any claim for pre-emption.

The plaintiff denied the allegations put forward in the written statement and maintained that the document was a document of mortgage and that his predecessor, Mahipat Singh, was, at the time the document was drawn up, the owner of the shares mentioned in the mortgage-deed. It was denied that any sale had taken place in favour of the defendant's predecessor.

Both the Courts below have come to findings which support the case put forward by the defendant and they have both held that, in spite of this document upon which the plaintiff relies, there is no relation of mortgagor and mortgagee between the parties. They have accordingly dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

There are two other matters which need be mentioned here. It was part of the plaintiff's case that the deed of mortgage had been executed in circumstances which gave the mortgagee an unfair advantage of which he availed himself for the purpose of extracting unconscionable terms from the mortgagor. In short, it was claimed that the contract rate of interest should not be allowed on the ground that undue influence had been exercised by the mortgagee. Another plea was also set up to the effect that the plaintiff was entitled to relief against the onerous terms of the mortgage on the ground that there had been an attempt on the part of the mortgagee to clog the equity of redemption. Both the Courts below have found that there was no undue influence and that there is no clog against which the plaintiff is entitled to relief; and, so, they have both held that in case it be found that the mortgage relation does exist between the parties the plaintiff is entitled to redeem only in accordance with the terms of the bond.

The first matter which is to be dealt with in second appeal is the defence which was set up by the defendant-respondent in this case. The case has been argued at great length before me but, put broadly, the argument on behalf of the appellant is that there is no evidence on the record to support the case which was set up by the defendant-respondent in his written pleadings and in the statements which were made by Counsel on his behalf in Court.

After much consideration of the case I have come to the conclusion that the argument for the plaintiff must prevail. I find that there is no evidence on the record to prove the story which was put forward by the defendant for the purpose of showing that the mortgage deed in suit was a sham document executed for the purpose of cloaking a previously completed transaction of sale.

Before I come to discuss this matter, it is necessary to refer to a few facts relating to the history of this property and the dealings which took place in connection with it. It is said that this property was, before the time of the British annexation, included in the taluqa held by the taluqdar of Mahmudabad. Whether that be so or not, it is a fact that the Summary Settlement was made with one Chhatar Pati Singh who is a collateral relative of the present plaintiff, Saheb Bakhsh Singh. Saheb Bakhsh Singh is a grandson of one Jawahir Singh while Chhatar Pati Singh was the grandson of one Basant Singh. The latter and Jawahir Singh were brothers. Mahipat Singh, the man who executed the deed now in suit, was the paternal uncle of the present plaintiff. Another person, whose name requires to be mentioned, is one Bhim Singh. He was a cousin of Mahipat Singh the man who executed the deed which is now before the Court.

When the time of the first Regular Settlement came, the Court of Wards was in charge of the Mahmudabad estate and a suit was brought on behalf of the estate for the recovery of these two villages of Sadrapur and Nankuin and of certain other property, the Summary Settlement of which had been made with Chhatar Pati Singh. The claim on behalf of the Mahmudabad estate was dismissed.

After this had taken place, suits were brought by Mahipat Singh and Bhim Singh against Chhatar Pati Singh for the recovery of certain shares in the property which had been settled with Chhatar Pati Singh including the two villages mentioned in the mortgage-deed. In appeal, Mahipat Singh and Bhim Singh won their claims and each of them got a 4-anna share in each of the two villages as also in certain other property. After this had taken place, the taluqdar, on being released from the Court of Wards, again brought suits for the purpose of recovering these villages and other properties on the ground that they belonged to the taluqa and had been wrongly settled with Chhatar Pati Singh. In those suits Mahipat Singh and Bhim Singh, who had already recovered their shares in the two villages mentioned in the deed, were made parties. In two cases, with which we are not concerned here, the taluqdar succeeded in obtaining a decree but in the other cases he was unsuccessful; and, so far as these two villages of Sadrapur and Nankuin were concerned, his case was definitely dismissed.

We come now to the 17th of March 1869. On that date Mahipat Singh and Bhim Singh made an application to the Settlement Officer asking that mutation should be made in favour of the taluqdar in respect of their shares in Sadrapur, Nankuin and eight pattis in certain villages in respect of which the suits of the Raja had been dismissed. In this application the previous history of the property was set out. There was a declaration that the property had been mortgaged before annexation to the predecessor in-interest of the taluqdar and that possession had been made over to the taluqdar. There was then a reference made to the Summary Settlement made in the year 1264 Fasli with Chhatar Pati Singh. It was stated in this petition that the Settlement was made with him because he had held a theka of the property from the taluqdar and because possession had been made over to him under the theka. The application then went on to recite that, in the Regular Settlement, the two applicants, that is to say, Bhim Singh and Mahipat Singh, had put forward claims against Chhatar Pati Singh and had got decrees against him for 4-annas share each in the property. It was stated further that the applicants had been supplied with funds for this litigation by the taluqdar. The prayer was that mutation should be made in favour of the taluqdar. There was no definite statement that the property had been actually transferred by sale or otherwise. There is nothing but a vague statement that the petitioners had received from the Raja the money which they had had to spend in running their cases against Chhatar Pati Singh.

SAHEB BAKHSH SINGH v. MOHAMMAD ALI.

The Settlement Officer, Mr. McMinn, refused to accept this application for mutation on the ground that there was before him no definite evidence of any transfer in favour of the Raja. After his order refusing to make mutation, the mortgage now in suit was executed. There were also executed, subsequent to the date of the Settlement Officer's order, certain other documents of transfer which are described as deeds of relinquishment. Later on, this document of mortgage was produced in the Settlement Court before a Settlement Officer who had succeeded Mr. McMinn. This gentleman apparently passed an order on the strength of this mortgage-deed directing that the taluqdar should be recorded in the khewat as the mortgagee of the properties mentioned in the deed.

It is now possible to set out clearly what the defence set up by the taluqdar in the present case was. The story is to be collected from paragraphs 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21 of the written statement. In the fourteenth paragraph of the written statement it was said that after the Court of Wards had lost the suit against Chhatar Pati the taluqdar's mother asked Mahipat Singh and Bhim Singh to file suits against Chhatar Pati Singh for the purpose of obtaining a decree against him and that it was proposed to them that after they had obtained such decrees they should be paid the expenses they incurred in the litigation against Chhatar Pati and in consideration of their being paid this sum they were to transfer the property decreed to the taluqdar who was a minor at that time. It is stated in paragraph fourteen of the written statement that both Mahipat and Bhim accepted this proposal. Paragraph fifteen refers to the suits which were brought by Mahipat Singh and Bhim Singh and to the decrees which they obtained in the month of September 1866. Paragraph sixteen refers to the suits subsequently brought by the Raja against Chhatar Pati Singh, Mahipat Singh and Bhim Singh and contains an admission that the suit brought in respect of the two villages mentioned in the mortgage-deed failed on the 5th of February 1869. Then we come to paragraph seventeen, which really contains the gist of the defence put forward by the taluqdar in this connection. This paragraph sets out that, after the Raja's suit against Chhatar Pati Singh, Mahipat Singh and Bhim Singh had failed, he called upon Mahipat Singh and Bhim Singh to fulfil the agreement referred to in paragraph fourteen of the written statement. It is alleged that thereupon Mahipat Singh transferred his share to the Raja by sale and put him in possession. The sale was an oral sale and the consideration which was paid was the sum which Mahipat Singh had been out of pocket in prosecuting his suits against Chhatar Pati Singh. It was also alleged in this paragraph, seventeen, that a further consideration was a grant to Mahipat Singh and his wife for their joint lives of the profits of two villages Sastipur and Gorehta. In paragraph twenty-four of the written statement it was alleged that the sum paid to Mahipat Singh on account of his law expenses in the cases he had against Chhatar Pati Singh amounted to Rs. 2, 500. Pausing here, it is at once clear that the allegations in paragraph seventeen amount to a statement that a definite sale had been arranged and completed in the early part of 1869 prior to the date of the application made for mutation.

Paragraph eighteen refers to the mutation application dated the 17th of March 1869 which has been mentioned above. Paragraphs nineteen and twenty refer to various incidents which took place in the course of the proceedings in mutation; and then we come to paragraph twenty-one, in which it is alleged that, in order to comply with the order of the Settlement Officer and to protect the property against a threatened claim for pre-emption made in the course of the mutation proceedings by Chhatar Pati Singh, Mahipat Singh executed the deed of mortgage on the 16th of June 1869. It was alleged, moreover, in this paragraph that a sum of Rs. 5,000 was paid to Mahipat Singh by way of "additional consideration" and that this deed did not affect, and was not in any way intended to affect, the sale transaction referred to in paragraph seventeen as already completed.

The plaintiff filed a written replication to these allegations. It is not necessary for me to refer to it in detail. It is sufficient to observe that it was denied that any such sale, as was referred to in the written statement of the defendant, had ever taken place.

SAHEB BAKHSH SINGH v. MOHAMMAD ALI.

Before parting with the pleadings in the case, it will be as well to refer to certain oral pleas which were put before the Court on behalf of the defendant. The plaintiff had complained in his replication that the defendant had not furnished particulars of the negotiations for the sale referred to in the written statement and had not specified the date on which the sale had been concluded. It is obvious that the Counsel who appeared for the defendant had some difficulty in answering these points put forward on behalf of the plaintiff. However, he stated that the facts upon which the defendant relied regarding his defence that a sale had taken place were all set out in paragraphs 14, 15, 17 and 18 of the written statement. He informed the Court that no specific date could be mentioned upon which the negotiations for sale had been commenced. All he could say was, that the bargaining between the parties began some time after March 1865 and that the whole transaction was completed early in the year 1869. Referring to the mortgage-deed of the 16th of June 1869, he described it as being a "nominal document" in the sense that the previous transaction of sale was intended to be given effect to under the guise of a deed of mortgage. I may say here that I am unable to understand the meaning of this last plea. It possibly means that the document in suit, although in form a mortgage, was in reality a deed of sale.

The learned Counsel added that a sum of Rs. 5,000 had actually passed at the time of the execution of this deed. He described this money as being "a part of the original consideration" for the sale which had been previously effected. My only comment on this last plea is that it is raising a case which is inconsistent with the other pleas which were taken in the written statement.

Before proceeding further on this part of the case, I may as well dispose of one objection which was raised in the Courts below and which had been repeated here. It is argued that the defendant was not entitled to raise the plea that this deed of mortgage was a fictitious document intended to cover a previously completed transaction of sale between the parties. I think the Courts below were right in saying that this objection was not tenable. It appears to me that the case is one which can fairly be said to fall within the purview of the first proviso to section 92 of the Indian Evidence Act. The defendant was entitled to prove any facts which would invalidate the document in suit, and he certainly could render the document invalid if he managed to prove that, at the date the mortgage was executed, the mortgagor was not the owner of the property while he (the mortgagee) was the full owner. A man cannot mortgage his own property to himself, and, if the defendant succeeded in establishing the story which he set up in his pleadings, there can be no doubt that the deed in suit must be deemed to be of no legal effect.

However, I am satisfied that the appellant is right when he contends that the story put forward by the defendant was not proved and that there is no evidence upon which it can be held that a sale actually took place before the mutation proceedings began in the month of March 1869. It is an unfortunate circumstance that both the Courts below have failed to keep in view what was the real point in issue between the parties. They have both allowed themselves to stray into a maze of speculation and the findings at which they have arrived seem to me, upon analysis, to be quite inconsistent with the case set up in the written statement. There has been, in both judgments, a great deal of irrelevent and futile discussion. Both the Courts refer to the "rival theories put forward by the parties." But we have nothing to do with theories put forward by the parties. Parties are under an obligation to plead facts and to prove them; and the question, therefore, really is whether the defendant gave proof of any facts from which it could be inferred that a sale had actually taken place in the early part of 1869. In order to show how the Courts have strayed away from the point, I may refer to certain passages in the judgment of the Subordinate Judge. After a great deal of speculative argument, he refers to the story put forward by the defendant in paragraph 14 of the written statement in which it was alleged that the preliminary arrangement for the sale of this property was entered into before Mahipat Singh and Bhim Singh commenced their litigation with Chhatar Pati Singh. The Subordinate Judge says that this story is not proved to be true and yet it is an essential part of the story which is put forward by the defendant. He also refers to the inability of the defendant to prove the time at which the sale took place. The Subordiante Judge then seems to have found himself in some difficulty in the matter of explaining how it came to pass that a sum of Rs 5,000 was advanced at the time of the execution of this mortgage deed. He tells us that the outside value of the property at the time was not more than Rs 3,500, and so it is apparent that the Rs. 5,000 which changed hands at the time the deed was executed was, to say the least of it, a fancy price. His conclusion was that the taluqdar was so anxious to get the property that he did not mind paying for it more than what it was worth. In this connection, however, he omits from consideration the allegation of the defendant that, in addition to this sum of Rs 5,000, the taluqdar had paid a sum of Rs. 2,500 on account of the costs. As regards this latter allegation, regarding the amount of costs, the Subordinate Judge in the concluding portion of his judgment finds that there is no proof that this sum was paid to Mahipat Singh. Having got himself into a tangle, the learned Subordinate Judge solved the difficulty before him by finding that the deed in suit was intended to take effect as a deed of sale. He says that the only finding open to him in the case was that the deed in suit was intended to be a deed of sale.

To begin with, as a matter of law, the defendant was not entitled to raise a case of this kind; and, in this connection, I need only refer to the judgment of Jenkins, C. J., in Dattoo v. Ramchandra Totaram (1), a decision which was cited with approval by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case reported as Maung Kyin v. Ma Shue La (2). But, over and above this, it is quite clear that the Subordinate Judge has found for the defendant a case which was never set up. It certainly was not the plea of the defendant that this mortgage deed in suit purported to operate as a deed of sale or was intended so to operate. The case was that it was a sham transaction which was not intended to have any legal effect but was, for the purpose of defeating a threatened claim to pre emption, drawn up in order to mask a transaction of sale already completed.

It is quite clear, therefore, that the judgment of the first Court cannot be supported. For similar reasons, it is impossible to sustain the judgment of the lower Appellate Court. There is, in the judgment of the learned Judge, a great deal of discussion of some vague agreement between the parties the object of which, according to the lower Court's judgment, was to "restore permanently" to the taluqdar the property that had been decreed to Bhim Singh and Mahipat Singh through the taluqdar's assistance. I entertain some doubt as to what the learned Judge of the Court below means by restoration. I cannot say whether he intended to find that the arrangement between the parties was one by way of restitution, that is to say, an arrangement by which Bhim Singh and Mahipat Singh were to restore to the Raja property to which they knew they had really no title. If that be the meaning of the learned Judge, then all that need be observed is that this was not the case which was set up by the defendant. Further, I find from the judgment of the learned Judge that he rejects as absurd the case put forward on behalf of the defendant that the reimbursement to Bhim Singh and Mahipat Singh of the costs which they had incurred in their litigation of Chhatar Pati Singh was to be the consideration for what the learned Judge calls "restoration." I agree with the learned Judge that such a story, on the face of it, does appear to be absurd. It is very difficult to understand why Bhim Singh and Mahipat Singh should agree to "restore" to the taluqdar any property which they won in their suits against Chhatar Pati Singh merely in consideration of their being paid their out-of-pocket expenses by the Raja. It is obvious enough that an arrangement of this kind brought no benefit whatever to Bhim Singh and Mahipat Singh. The point, however, is that this story, which the learned Additional Judge calls absurd, is the very story which the defendant sets up in paragraph seventeen of his written statement. Another observation which I have to make on the judgment of the lower Appellate Court is this. The learned Judge, after a good deal of discussion of the matter, seems to have come to the conclusion that the story of the payment of Rs. 5,000 at the time of the execution of this mortgage deed was a myth. Here, again, the Court has gone off the rails, for it was the case of both parties that this sum of Rs. 5,000 had been paid.

I do not propose to discuss at any greater length the judgments and the reason of the Courts below. I can say definitely, after an examination of the record, that there is no evidence upon which any Court could have found that a definite transaction of sale had been concluded between the parties before the 17th of March 1869—a sale by which the shares mentioned in the deed in suit were transferred by Mahipat Singh to the taluqdar in consideration for a sum of Rs. 2,500 alleged to have been paid to Mahipat Singh on account of the costs he had incurred in litigation. I may say that I regard all the dealings which took place between the parties subsequent to the 17th of March 1869 as being no evidence to support the story which was raised for the defence. There was a definite case put forward that the whole transaction of sale had been completed before March 1869. That case has failed, in my opinion, entirely and the result, therefore, is that the deed in suit must be deemed to operate as a mortgage.

It now remains to discuss only two other matters, and it will not be necessary for me to refer to them at any great length. The plaintiff's case was that this mortgage had been procured by the exercise of undue influence. As I have mentioned before both the Courts below have found against this plea and I agree with their findings. There is no evidence whatever to show either that the taluqdar in 1869 was in a position to dominate the will of the mortgagor, Mahipat Singh; nor, again, is there any evidence to show that he really took an unfair advantage. This finding puts an end to any case of undue influence. There remains the other plea of clog which has been argued at some length by the learned Counsel for the appellant. I may observe at once that it is somewhat curious to find a plea like this proceeding from a mortgagor who, being entitled to bring his suit for redemption in the year 1899, refrained from this. It seems to me that no relief can be allowed to the plaintiff on the equitable ground that the terms of the mortgage-deed constitute a fetter upon the right to redeem. The learned Counsel refers to the very high rate of interest and to the fact that interest was to be paid by the mortgagor during the period of the mortgage. I have mentioned above that the covenant relating to interest was that the mortgagee was to be entitled to appropriate the profits and he was, in addition, to be entitled at the time of redemption to interest at the rate of 24 per cent. per annum simple on the principal amount. The plaintiff relies chiefly on this latter stipulation regarding the payment of interest at the rate of 24 per cent. per annum and points out that this is indicative of an intention to render redemption all but impossible. I do not think it is open to the plaintiff to put forward a case of clog merely upon the ground that a high rate of interest has been stipulated for in the deed. One of the findings of the Courts below is that the property was of comparatively small value and that the sum of Rs. 5,000 advanced on this mortgage was far more than the property was worth. Another point made by the Courts below is that, at the time the mortgage was made, the profits accruing from the mortgaged property amounted to a sum which would gave the mortgagee only between 5 and 6 per cent. on his money. I am not prepared, therefore, to hold that there is anything in the stipulation for interest which, in the absence of any proof of undue influence or unfair dealing, entitles the plaintiff to any relief. As observed by Dr. Ghosh in his book on the Law of Mortgage, at page 222 of the 4th Edition, "a mortgagor may no doubt claim to be relieved from an oppressive bargain, but he can only do so under the same conditions as a debtor who has obtained an advance without any security, and is not entitled to any preferential treatment." I agree with what is said by the learned author and also with his further statement that, in the absence of undue influence, fraud or coercion, a mortgage cannot be treated as an exception to the general rule that parties must be held bound by their contract. The plaintiff is entitled, in my opinion, to redeem but he can only redeem on the terms contained in the mortgage.

The result, therefore, is that the appeal is allowed. The decree of the Court below is set aside. The plaintiff will be given a decree for redemption on payment of the principal sum and interest at the contract rate up to the time fixed for payment. A decree for redemption in the usual form will be prepared. The plaintiff is, in my opinion, entitled to his costs in all three Courts.

Defendant sold certain land to a vendee. Plaintiff pre-empted the sale, obtained a decree, paid the purchase-money and was put into possession of the property but he failed to get mutation of names effected in his own favour. Subsequently, both parties applied for imperfect partition of their recorded shares. The partition was accordingly effected and the property in dispute was allotted to the defendant, in whose name it stood. Plaintiff applied for correction of the records, but his application was rejected. He then brought a suit for a declaration that the property in dispute belonged to him and that it had been wrongly allotted to the defendant:

Mr. Baleshwari Prasad, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case, so far as we have been able to discover them from the record, are as follows:—

In the year 1897, or thereabouts, one Kanak Singh sold certain property to a certain vendee. The present plaintiff appellant brought a suit for pre-emption and obtained a decree and apparently paid up the amount of money and was put in possession. In the year 1913 a co-sharer in the village applied for an imperfect partition of his share. Up to that date the pre-emptor had not obtained mutation of names in respect to the pre empted property. Kanak Singh had then died and is represented now by the present defendants-respondents. These defendants-respondents also applied for an imperfect partition of their share as recorded in the khewat which included the pre-empted share. The pre-emptor also applied for an imperfect partition of his recorded share which did not include the pre-empted share. Certain other persons also applied for partition of their shares. A partition proceeding was drawn up under which to the present defendants-respondents was allotted the whole share which stood recorded in their names, and which included the pre empted share. To the present plaintiff-appellant was allotted the share which stood in his name in the khewat and that did not include the pre-empted share. The partition proceedings continued. We note that in the partition proceedings that we have mentioned above, the tarz i-taqsim, was drawn up in January 1915. In October 1915 the present plaintiff-appellant awoke to the wrong entry of the defendants' names in the records. He applied to the Pargana Officer to have his name entered against it. That officer directed mutation in his favour. The opposite party, the defendants-respondents, appealed and the Collector on appeal upset the order of the Pargana Officer. The plaintiff took it up on further appeal but lost the case. On the 19th of June 1916 the partition proceedings were concluded and finally sanctioned and came into effect on the 1st of July 1916. On the 28th November 1916 the plaintiff brought the present suit for a declaration that the pre-empted share which stood in the name of the defendants and which had been allotted to them by the partition belonged to him and did not belong to them. The Courts below have held that the plaintiff is in actual possession of the property and the lower Appellate Court has held that the suit being one with reference to the partition of a mahal is barred by section 233 (k). This decision has been upheld by a Single Judge of this Court: hence the present Letters patent appeal.

An examination of the plaint shows clearly that the object of the present suit is to upset the partition proceedings. The plaintiff in his plaint sets forth the facts of the partition case in the Revenue Court and the fact that he applied for the correction of the khewat and failed; and hence he asks the Court for a declaration that he is entitled to the property. The case is, in our opinion, fully covered by the old Full Bench case of Muhammad Sadiq v. Laute Ram (1). That case was followed subsequently in the case of Bijai Misir v. Kali Prasad Misir (2). The question is really a difficult question for decision. It is open to more than one opinion. The view taken in the case of Muhammad Sadiq v. Laute Ram (1), had been consistently followed until the decision in Bijai Misir v. Kali Prasad Misir (2), when, for the first time, the then learned Chief Justice proposed to depart from it. The other Judges, who constituted the Full Bench, however, differed. There was a former decision to be found in Shambhu Singh v. Daljit Singh (3) which, however, in our opinion, does not affect the decision in the case of Muhammad Sadiq v. Laute Ram (1). The learned Chief Justice, no doubt, was of the opposite opinion to that expressed in the former Full Bench decision but the two learned Judges who sat with him decided the case on a totally different point; as a close perusal of the judgment will disclose.

In view of the former decisions of this Court on the point, we must hold that the decision of the learned Judge of this Court is correct and this appeal, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 145—Principal and surety—Decree against both—Surety discharging decree by executing mortgage in favour of decree-holder—Mortgage, whether good "payment"—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, r. 2—Adjustment out of Court—Adjustment not certified, when may be ignored.

A decree was obtained against the plaintiff as surety jointly with the principal debtor: the plaintiff paid off the debt by executing a mortgage in favour of the decree-holder, and brought the present suit to recover the amount paid by him as surety from the heirs of the principal debtor:

Held, that the suit was maintainable, as the mortgage, being a conveyance or a transfer of property and not merely the incurring of a pecuniary obligation, was a good payment under section 145 of the Contract Act. [p. 124, col. 1.]

Under rule 2, Order XXI, of the Civil Procedure Code an adjustment of decree out of Court which is not certified to the Court can only be ignored in proceedings in execution of that particular decree. [p. 124, col. 1.]

Revision of the judgment of the Small Cause Court, Akola, in Small Cause Suit No. 2121 of 1918, dated the 15th April 1919.

Mr. M. B. Niyogi, for the Applicants.

Mr. M. R. Bobde, for the Non-Applicant.

JUDGMENT.—A third party obtained a decree against Kanna, the deceased father of the two defendants, as a principal debtor, jointly with the plaintiff as his surety. The plaintiff, Sheikh Chotu, paid off the debt by a mortgage executed by his wife in favour of the decree-holder. The mortgage bond recites that the decree has been satisfied. The present suit was filed by Sheikh Chotu for recovery of the amount paid by him as a surety from the heirs of Kanna, the principal debtor, and the plaintiff has been given a decree for which he asked.

The defendants have applied for revision on the ground that the execution of the mortgege, being no more than an undertaking to pay, was no payment of the debt and, therefore, gave the surety no right of action. A mortgage is a conveyance or a transfer of property and not merely an incurring of pecuniary obligation and is, therefore, a good "payment" under section 145 of the Contract Act, as was held in Anwarkhan v. Gulam Kasam (1) and Putti Narayanamurthi Ayyar v. Marimuthu Pillai (2). The learned Pleader for the applicants attempted to argue, further, that as the payment had never been certified by the Court executing the decree, the debt has not been extinguished. This is an entirely new plea raising a question of fact. It is quite possible that the adjustment has been so certified. In any case, the adjustment can only be ignored under Order XXI, rule 2, of the Civil Procedure Code, in the execution proceedings of this particular decree, and as the decree-holder appeared as a witness in this case and admitted that his decree had been completely satisfied, the defendants do not seem to stand in any particular danger.

The application is rejected, and the applicants must pay the costs, in which the Pleader's fee will be Rs. 15.

CIVIL APPEAL NO. 27 OF 1919.
March 26, 1920.
Present :—Mr. Justice Sadasiva Aiyar and Mr. Justice Spencer.

GOPALA KRISHNIER (MINOR) BY NEXT FRIEND SAMBASIVA AIYAR—DEFENDANT No. 2—APPELLANT

GANAPATHY AIYAR AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS AND DEFENDANT No. 1—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 92—Suit instituted with sanction of Advocate-General—Party, addition of, after institution—Fresh sanction, whether necessary—Test—Charitable institution—Chatram—Person possessing substantial interest, who is—Trustee, devolution of office of, in founder's family—Vacancy in office, effect of.

Where in a suit instituted with the sanction of the Advocate-General under section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code, it is necessary to add a defendant, the test for determining whether such addition requires a fresh sanction from the Advocate-General before the suit can be proceeded with against him, is whether the scope of the suit has been really enlarged by the addition of the new party. [p. 125, col. 2.]

A person who has devoted time and energy in order to place the affairs of a chatram on a proper footing and to see that the objects of the trust are duly carried out, is a person possessing a substantial interest in the maintenance of the charity so as to entitle him to sue under section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code, so, too, a person who lives in the neighbourhood of such an institution, and as a member of the community, is entitled to make use of the choultry. [p 123, col. 1.]

Where the founder of a charity has provided for the office of trustee being held by the members of the founder's family and a vacancy occurs in the trusteeship, the office reverts to the family members in the line of the founder. [p. 129, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Negapatam, in Original Suit No. 80 of 1917.

FACTS.—Scheme suit under section 92, Civil Procedure Code. Plaintiffs were two alleged worshippers living outside the locality where the trust was situate. The 1st defendant was the son of the founder and was superseded from trusteeship by the High Court [Ganapati Ayyan v. Savithri Ammal (1)] at whose direction a trustee was appointed in 1897. That trustee died in 1917. The High Court's decree had directed the President of the District Board of Tanjore to fill up the vacancy when it should occur. The President was not a party to the decree. He refused to exercise the power of appointment. Hence this suit. The 2nd defendant was the son of the 1st defendant. He was added as a party at the objection of the 1st defendant by order of Court. But no sanction was obtained from the Advocate-General for adding him as a party. The lower Court framed a scheme. The 2nd defendant appealed.

This appeal came on for hearing, on the 13th August 1919, before Sadasiva Aiyar, and Burn, JJ.

The Hon'ble Mr. T. Arumainatha Pillai, for the Respondents, took a preliminay objection that no appeal lay as there was no "decree" against the 2nd defendant and cited Aiyappa Mudaliar v. Gopalaswami Mudaliar (2).

Mr. A. Krishnaswamy Aiyar, for the Appellant.—My contention is that the High Court's scheme proved futile and so on the death of the trustee appointed, the trusteeship reverted to the founder's family. Inasmuch as it could not vest in the 1st defendant, it has vested in the 2nd defendant. So the scheme does operate substantially against the 2nd defendant. The lower Court has drawn up a decree. In Aiyappa Mudaliar v. Gopalaswami Mudaliar (2) there was no decree drawn up. I submit that the appeal is competent. (The preliminary objection was overruled).

The suit is not maintainable in view of the Full Bench decision in Ramachandra Iyer v. Parameswaran Munbu (3). The plaintiffs, not being residents of the place where the trust is situate and as they do not allege that they are regular worshippers, have not the "interest" required to maintain the suit.

[SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—Has the objection been taken in your written statement.]

The point has been raised in the lower Court.

Yes.

My next contention is, that the suit as against the appellant must fail as the Advocate-General's sanction did not extend thereto. The scope of the suit has been enlarged and a decree has been passed which operates against the appellant also. See Abdul Rahman v. Cassum Ebrahim (4) following Davis v. Duke of Marlborough (5). See also Sayad Hussain Miyan v. Collector of Kaira (6).

Vaithilingam v. Ramalingam Pillai (7) and Mulukutla Ramamurthi v. Chillara Bhaskarayya (8) proceed upon the ground that where formal parties are added without enlarging the scope of the suit sanction is not essential. So they do not apply.

The Hon Mr. Arumainatha Pillai, in reply.—The plaintiffs were not responsible for the addition of the 2nd defendant who was added by order of Court on objection by the 1st defendant. Farther, the decision in Vaithilingam v. Ramalingam Pillai (7) covers the point.

JUDGMENT.—The second defendant is the appellant before us. The suit was brought with the Advocate-General's sanction under section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code for the framing of a scheme for the conduct of certain charities, for the appointment of a new trustee or new trustees (the office of trustee have become vacant according to the allegations in the plaint) and for other appropriate reliefs.

A preliminary objection was taken for the respondents that no appeal lay, because no determination of any question between the parties has been arrived at by the lower Court, and their learned Vakil relied upon the decision in Aiyappa Mudaliar v. Gopalaswami Mudaliar (2). But in that case no decree was at all drawn up embodying any determination of the Court, whereas in the present case a formal decree has been drawn up determining that there is a vacancy in the office of trustee and that the plaintiffs are entitled to a declaration that the trusteeship is not vested in the second defendant and that there is a vacancy which enabled the Court to frame a scheme. We, therefore, think that there is nothing in the preliminary objection put forward on behalf of the respondents.

Coming to the appeal, two technical objections to the maintainability of the suit were argued. One was, that the Advocate-General's sanction did not cover the prosecution of the suit as against the second defendant, because he was added as a party some time after the suit was filed. Reliance is placed on Abdul Rahman v. Cassum Ebrahim (4) and on an English decision on which Abdul Rahman v. Cassum Ebrahim (4) was supported by the learned Judges who decided it. We think that the test to be applied to the solution of the question whether the addition of a party requires a fresh sanction from the Advocate General before the suit against him could be proceeded with, is whether the scope of the suit has been really enlarged by the addition of the new party. Following the decision in Vaithilingam v. Ramalingam Pillai (7) and Mulukutla Ramamurthi v. Chillara Bhaskarayya (8) we hold, having regard to the pleading and the character of this suit, that the addition of the second defendant has not enlarged the scope of the suit. We, therefore, overrule this contention.

The next contention is based upon the decision of the Full Bench of this Court in the case reported in Ramachandra Iyer v. Parameswaran Munbu (3). That any objection could be successfully based on the strength of Ramachandra Iyer v. Parameswaran Munbu (3) seems not to have been present to the mind of any of the parties (either the plaintiffs or the defendants) till after the written statement was filed and till about the time of the framing of the issues which was done on the 20th February 1918. The plaintiffs did not, therefore, mention in the plaint that they had such an interest in the charitable trust as, according to the Full Bench decision, would entitle them to bring a suit of this character with the consent of the Advocate-General. The defendants also did not contend in their written statement that the plaintiffs did not possess such an interest. However, as issues have to be framed not only on the pleadings but on the contentions put forward by the parties and their Pleaders at the time of issues, the Court ought to have considered the allegations then made by the Pleaders of the defendants and settled the issues with reference to those allegations also. It is desirable that such allegations relating to the existence or non-existence of the interest required by law in the plaintiffs to enable them to maintain this suit should be in the form of affidavits or verified statements and as it is now alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs that they have got such an interest, we direct the plaintiffs to amend the plaint by adding allegations clearly setting out in detail the interest which entitles them to maintain the suit as plaintiffs. On such amendment being made, the lower Court should give time to the defendants to file written statements with respect to those allegations, and an issue or issues should be framed and decided as regards that question. Acting under Order XLI, rule 25, we direct the lower Court to frame the necessary issues (after allowing the parties to put forward the additional pleadings) already mentioned, to try the issues and to return its findings on the issues and the reasons for the findings within four months from the receipt of the records. The suit is remitted to the lower Court for this purpose. The plaintiffs will be allowed to amend the plaint within three weeks of the receipt of records by the lower Court. Seven days will be allowed for objections to the finding.

In pursuance of the order contained in the above judgment the Subordinate Judge of Negapatam submitted the following

FINDING:—The suit has been remanded by the High Court to enable the plaintiffs to amend the plaint setting out the nature of the interest which they possessed in the plaint institution in the light of the decision in Ramachandra Iyer v. Parameswaran Munbu (3) with liberty to the defendants to file written statements with respect to those allegations and directing this Court to frame the necessary issue and to return a finding thereon after taking fresh evidence tendered by the parties.

The plaint has been amended and written statement filed and the following additional issue framed:—

"Whether the plaintiffs have a legal interest to maintain this suit?"

2. In the Full Bench case Ramachandra Iyer v. Parameswaran Munbu (3) it is pointed out that section 539 of the Code of 1877, which corresponds to section 92 of the present Code, was based on Romilly's Act, that under the said Act it has been held in one case that the person entitled to sue must possess "a direct interest" and in another case that he must have "a clear interest", that the expression "direct interest" employed in the said section was construed too strictly by certain of the Indian High Courts with the result that in Jan Ali v. Ram Nath Mundul (9) it was decided that Muhammadans, residing in the village of Gopalpur and in the habit of attending prayers at the mosque there, had not "a direct interest" in the endowment of the mosque within the meaning of the section, that thereupon the Legislature interfered and eliminated the word "direct", that the object of the elimination was not to make a departure from the principle of Romilly's Act but merely to discountenance the illiberal construction placed upon the expression previously employed and to enable the persons in the position of the plaintiffs in Jan Ali v. Ram Nath Mundul (9) to maintain a suit under the said section. In the opinion of the learned Chief Justice, "the interest in the trust must still, in Lord Eldon's words, be a clear interest, that it is to say, a present and substantial, and not a remote and fictitious, or purely illusory, interest, and that, whilst indicating the necessity of taking a more liberal view than had been taken by our Courts in some cases, the Legislature did not intend that we should go to the other extreme and allow any member of the Hindu and Muhammadan public to sue with the requisite consent in regard to every temple or mosque in British India." In the words of Mr. Justice Oldfield, the interest intended "is an interest which is substantial and not sentimental or remote." His Lordship observes that, "Proof of residence in the neighbourhood of the institution will no doubt be one way of establishing possession of an interest, not by any analogy with the rights of parishioners in England, but on the simpler ground that those who live near to the institution will be most likely to take advantage of its benefits." According to Mr. Justice Coutts Trotter, "the interest required by the Statute to reside in the relator must be, in the words of Lord Eldon, 'clear' or, in the words of the learned Chief Justice in this case, 'a present and substantial, and not a remote and fictitious, or purely illusory, interest'; or, in the words of the learned Judges in Mohiuddin v. Sayiduddin (10), 'an existing interest and not a mere contingency.'" His Lordship adds, "beyond that, it seems to me that the question as to whether any given person has or has not an interest, as so defined, is a pure question of fact and must be left to the Court, before whom he appears, to decide in the light of these general principles on a consideration of the particular circumstances of each case." The question for the Court's consideration is whether the plaintiffs in this case possessed such an interest as is set forth above in the plaint institution.

3. Now, the undisputed facts are these:— The 1st plaintiff was one of two persons who successfully prosecuted a suit under section 30 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882 in connection with this very institution—vide, Ganapati Ayyan v. Savithri Ammal (1). He formerly lived at Nemmeli, which is 9 furlongs from the suit chatram, and possessed an interest as a partner in a rice mill there. He now resides at Mannargudi, which is 8 miles from the suit chatram, and still claims an interest in the said rice mill at Nemmeli and in a portion of the house which he formerly occupied at that place. He also swears that he has taken meals at the chatram on various occasions. The other side, however, does not concede that he has so taken meals and further questions his alleged interest in the said house and rice mill. The 2nd plaintiff is a permanent resident of Nemmeli. He also affirms that he is a Dayadhi of the original donor and that he has been taking meals at times at the choultry, though these two facts are not admitted by the other side.

4. It seems to me that the 1st plaintiff, having in the past devoted his time and energy in order that the affairs of the chatram might be placed on a proper footing and that the objects of the trust were duly carried out, must be considered to be a person possessing an interest in the institution to see that the fruits of his labour are not lost. He is also a resident of Mannargudi and has occasion to go to Nemmeli. In doing so, he has to pass by the suit choultry which lies on the way. The choultry is intended for the benefit of the Brahmins generally. Being a member of that community, he is entitled to take meals at the choultry if he chooses to do so. Living within 8 miles of the choultry and having occasion to pass by it his chances of resorting to it are not remote.

5. As regards the 2nd plaintiff, living in the neighbourhood of the institution and being a member of the Brahmin community and as such entitled to make use of the choultry he must, in the light of the observations of Mr. Justice Oldfield quoted above, be held to be a person possessing an interest in the institution. It is urged that he is a well-to do peson and as such is not likely to resort to the choultry, all the more so, as his house is situated within easy distance thereof. But the benefit of the choultry is not limited to the poor nor to travellers coming from a distance, but to Brahmins in general without restriction of sect or grade in life.

6. For the above reasons, I find that the plaintiffs have a legal interest to maintain the suit.

This appeal coming on for final hearing, after the return of the finding of the lower Court upon the issues referred by this Court for trial, the Court delivered the following

JUDGMENT.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—The suit was brought by two plaintiffs with the sanction of the Advocate General to have a scheme framed in respect of a choultry charity established in Nemmeli in the Mannargudi Taluk, Tanjore District.

The first question argued in this appeal is whether the plaintiffs have got the necessary substantial interest to institute the suit, having regard to the Full Bench decision in Ramachandra Iyer v. Parameswaran Munbu (3). On the evidence taken on remand, I am clearly of opinion that the plaintiffs have got such a substantial interest in the maintenance of the charity and that their interests are not merely "sentimental" or too "remote."

The next question is whether the finding of the lower Court that the second defendant is not a trustee of the institution and that there is, therefore, a vacancy in the office of trustee which has to be filled up, in other words, whether the opinion of the lower Court that the consideration of the question whether the 2nd defendant should be removed from the office of trusteeship before providing in the new scheme for the appointment of a trustee does not arise in this case owing to the 2nd defendant not being a trustee is correct. The lower Court says "the effect of the High Court's judgment in the case reported as Ganapati Ayyan v. Savithri Ammal (1) which, in my humble opinion, completely put an end to the right of trusteeship created in favour of his heirs by Gopalakrishna Ayyar" (the grandfather of the minor 2nd defendant and the father of the 1st defendant) "is to create a new line of trustees which, however, depended for its continuation on the willingness of the District Board of Tanjore to interfere as each vacancy arose to appoint a new trustee. The argument of the 2nd defendant's Pleader assumes that the trusteeship cannot be vacant even for a moment and that somebody or other must have become a trustee by operation of law as soon as the High Court's scheme proved to be ineffective, a proposition for which there is no authority." To understand these observations of the lower Court, a few facts have to be stated. The founder of the feeding charity in question was the 1st defendant's father. He was also the 1st trustee. The 1st defendant became a trustee on his father's death in accordance with the directions of the trust instrument. He was dismissed for misconduct in a suit brought on behalf of all the interested public by a few persons who were permitted to sue on such behalf under section 30 of the old Civil Procedure Code. (That suit was not instituted under section 539 of the old Code of Civil Procedure corresponding to the present section 92). It was in that suit that the final decision referred to above was passed by the High Court [see the judgment reported as Ganapati Ayyan v. Savithri Ammal (1)]. That decree became ineffective by the refusal of the District Board to appoint a successor to the trustee appointed by the lower Court on dismissal of the 1st defendant. All the parties interested thought that the High Court itself had the power in execution in pursuance of its own decree to appoint a successor, but when the matter came up before this Court in Civil Miscellaneous Petitions 717 and 983 of 1917 my learned brother, sitting with Srinivasa Aiyangar, J., held as follows:—"There being no provision in the old decree allowing an application for an alteration of the scheme and there being no provision of the Code under which we can entertain an application either for an alteration of the scheme or for the appointment of a new trustee, we are unable to entertain these applications. Any alteration of the scheme or a fresh appointment of a trustee can only be made in a suit under section 92 of the present Civil Procedure Code instituted for that purpose." It was in consequence of these observations that the present suit seems to have been instituted.

I do not think that the above decision passed on those petitions precludes the 2nd defendant from contending that, under the general law, when a vacancy occurred in the office of trustee, the trusteeship reverted to the family members in the line of the founder and that, the 1st defendant, having been made incapable during his lifetime of claiming the trusteeship owing to his dismissal in the former suit (he has also disclaimed any right in himself in the pleadings in this suit), 2nd defendant, the son of the 1st defendant, who was not in existence at the time of the former suit, has become the trustee as he belongs to the family of the founder. I accept the contention as it is supported by the decision in Boidyo Gauranga Sahu v. Sudevi Mata (11) that the trusteeship has so reverted to the 2nd defendant. The lower Court's preliminary decree will be, therefore, modified by omitting the words "that there is a vacancy in the office of the trusteeship of the plaint charity", and "the 2nd defendant on account of his minority be disqualified to hold the trusteeship of the plaint charity." The Subordinate Judge's Court while framing a scheme may, of course, if it considers it advisable in the interests of the institution, appoint an acting trustee during the minority of the 2nd defendant.

The first defendant will bear his own costs. The costs of the other parties will be provided for in the final orders to be passed in the suit.

SPENCER, J.—I agree.

Present:—Mr. Justice Coutts and Mr. Justice Adami.

Lala RAM NARAIN LAL AND ANOTHER—APPELLANTS

Lala MURLIDHAR AND ANOTHER—RESPONDENTS.

Mortgage—Consolidation, when can be effected—Redemption, whether can be effected piece-meal—Usufructuary mortgages, several, on same property, whether permissible Compromise by some of several successors of mortgagor, whether binding on others.

The right of consolidation requires that the mortgages shall have been originally made by the same mortgagor, it does not exist where one mortgage is by a sole mortgagor and the other mortgage is by the same mortgagor jointly with another A mortgage by a co-owner of his share of the estate cannot be consolidated with a mortgage of the entirety. [p. 131, col. 1]

The right of consolidation can be asserted against successors-in-title to the mortgagors only so long as the equities of redemption are not severed. [p. 131, col. 1.]

There cannot be two different usufructuary mortgages on the same lands at the same time. [p. 131, col. 2]

Two out of five representatives of a mortgagor entered into a compromise with the mortgagees whereby they purported to effect a fresh mortgage of the entire mortgaged property in lieu of the old usufructuary mortgage. In a suit by the successors of all the five co-heirs for redemption of the original mortgage:

Held, that the compromise was invalid, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to redeem the original mortgage on the terms entered therein. [p. 132, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decision of the District Judge, Shahabad.

Messrs. C. C. Das and S. N. Bose, for the Appellants.

Mr. Lachmi Narayan Singh, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

ADAMI, J.—This second appeal arises out of a suit in which the plaintiffs sought the redemption of a usufructuary mortgage on payment of Rs. 100.

It appears that in 1269 F. S. Musammat Subhagi, widow of Mathura Lal, executed a usufructuary mortgage of 25 bighas of land in favour of Lala Amani Lal, predecessor of the defendant, in consideration of a payment of Rs. 200. It was stipulated that the mortgagor might redeem the mortgage at the end of Jeyth of any year after nine years, and that if the mortgagor paid her own money to redeem the mortgage, no interest would be payable over and above that received as profits from the land; while, if she had to borrow money and encumber the property in any way, though no interest would be charged on the first Rs. 100, interest at the rate of 12 per cent. par annum would be payable on the second Rs. 100.

Further advances were taken, it seems, by the mortgagor and her successors and separate bonds were executed to secure these amounts. On the death of Subhagi there was a Collectorate partition between the five successors who each received a one fifth share.

After the partition in 1876, two of these successors instituted a suit against the mortgagees to recover possession of 11 bighas out of the 26 bighas, as their two fifths-share. The three other successors were joined as pro forma defendants. That suit ended in a decree embodying a compromise entered into between the plaintiffs and the principal defendants, the mortgagees. The pro forma defendants, the other three successors, were no parties to the compromise. The effect of the comrpomise was that there had been an adjustment of the mortgage-debt and other debts of the mortgagors to the mortgagees and Rs. 500 in all had been found due to the mortgagees. It was agreed that, in consideration of that amount, the defendants, mortgagees, were to continue in possession of the 26 bighas and if within one year the mortgagors did not pay the amount due, interest at 6 per cent. per annum was to be paid on Rs. 400, and the remaining Rs. 100 was to be free of interest, reference being made to the condition in the mortgage-bond of 1269 that Rs. 100 was to be free of interest. The suit was decreed in the above terms.

It is to be noted that the plaintiffs in that suit, though the suit was for recovery of possession of 11 bighas as their two-fifths share, obtained a decree on their compromise which amounted to a usufructuary mortgage of the whole 26 bighas.

In the Settlement operations the sum of Rs. 500 has been entered in the record as the amount payable for the redemption of the 26 bighas.

In the present suit the plaintiffs, who are the sole successors of all five of the mortgagors who were parties defendant to the suit of 1876, sought to redeem the mortgage of 1269. The defendants claimed that the mortgage of 1876 had been substituted for that of 1269 and that Rs. 1,455 was now their charge on the property for principal and interest.

The learned Munsif held that as in the earlier suit only two fifths share of the property was claimed, the decree could have effect only to the extent of a two-fifths share and extinguished the former mortgage for Rs. 200 only to that extent. He decided that the compromise terms were not a clog on the equity of redemption as they operated to the extent of a two-fifths share to create a new mortgage in the place of the original one. By calculation he found Rs. 734-8-0 to be the amount payable by the plaintiffs to redeem the mortgage and decreed the suit accordingly.

On appeal, the learned District Judge was of opinion that the compromise decree only gave effect to the stipulation in the first mortgage that money might be borrowed to the full value of the land, and that the compromise decree created a new mortgage on the land for the total amount of the debt. He decided that the plaintiffs could redeem the whole of the land on payment of the whole of the mortgage-money on it, and that if the second transaction extinguished two-fifths of the first transaction only the three-fifths of the land is still liable for three-fifths of the first transaction. He dismissed the appeal.

In the present appeal it is contended that the compromise was bad and could not have any effect on the mortgage of 1269 in that it was entered into by two only out of the five mortgagors and the suit in which the decree was given was for recovery of only two-fifths of the mortgage property. It is argued, first that the subject-matter of the agreement did not exist and the agreement was a mere paper transaction; secondly, that a mortgage being an indivisible security, if part of the agreement in 1876 failed by reason that it was bad as to a three fifths share it must be bad as to the whole; thirdly, that there could not be two usufructuary mortgages on the same land at the same time, and, fourthly, that the conditions of the second transaction fettered the right of redemption of the first mortgage as a clog and were, therefore, void. These contentions must, I think, succeed.

The suit in 1876 was not a suit for redemption it was a suit to recover possession of their two-fifths share in the property by two of the successors of Musammat Subhagi on her death. Had these two persons sued to redeem their shares only the suit would seemingly have been barred by the last paragraph of section 60 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882.

Obviously, the two persons who entered into the compromise could, under no circumstances, mortgage more than their two-fifths share in the property the agreement was bad so far as the remaining three-fifths was concerned.

It cannot be contended that the second transaction was a mortgage in substitution for the earlier one, the parties were not identical and only a two fifths share of the mortgaged property could be affected by the second transaction; nor can it be said that there has been a consolidation of mortgages, for the right of consolidation requires that the mortgages shall have been originally made by the same mortgagor, it does not exist where one mortgage is by a sole mortgagor and the other mortgage is by the same mortgagor jointly with another. A mortgage by a co-owner of his share of the estate cannot be consolidated with a mortgage of the entirety [Thorneycroft v. Crockett (1)]. It may be that the right exists where one mortgage is made by the mortgagor and another by persons claiming by devolution from him on his death [White v. Hillacre (2)] but in the present case only two out of five of such persons purport to have mortgaged the property.

The right of consolidation can be asserted against successors-in-title to the mortgagors only so long as the equities of redemption are not severed [Willie v. Lugg (3), Jones v. Smith (4)]. Here the transaction entered into by the two persons purported to sever the equity of redemption which the other three had in the prior mortgage.

A mortgage is an indivisible security for the debt and every part of it, and a mortgagor cannot redeem piece-meal. If the agreement of 1876, which cannot bind the plaintiffs as they were not parties to the compromise, is held to be a substituted mortgage of two-fifths of the mortgaged lands, the plaintiffs would be able to redeem only to the extent of three-fifths, and that would mean that the original security had been broken up.

Each one of the five mortgagors was interested in the payment of the mortgage-money, and the redemption of the property; here two of the five, by entering into the compromise mortgage, sought to fetter the right of the other three to redeem the first mortgage on payment of the sum mentioned in that mortgage-deed.

Furthermore, the second transaction created a second usufructuary mortgage with mortgagors who were not identical with the mortgagors in the first mortgage. It is clear that there cannot be two different usufructuary mortgages on the same lands at the same time.

The respondents have placed reliance on the cases of Ranjit Khan v. Ramdhan Singh (5) and Brij Lal Singh v. Bhawani Singh (6), where it was decided that, where, subsequent to the execution of a mortgage, the mortgagors took further advances from the mortgagees and stipulated in the bonds that the amounts covered by them should be paid off before the first mortgage could be redeemed, such stipulation could not be held to be a clog on the equity of redemption. Those cases were, however, different from the present one, the parties to both transactions were identical, while here the second mortgage could not bind three of the five successors to the original mortgagor.

Lastly, it is contended by the respondents that the appellants are barred by estoppel from contesting the second mortgage, in that they are the successors of the two mortgagors who entered into the transaction. But no question of estoppel can arise for the two mortgagors at the time of that transaction made no representation that they were entitled to mortgage the entire 26 bighas. It was plainly stated in the compromise and the decree based on it, that they only had two fifths share, and the mortgagees knew fully that such was the fact. It is true that the present appellants are the successors of the two mortgagors, but they are also the successors of all five of the successors to Musammat Subhagi, the first mortgagor. The validity of the second mortgage has to be considered with regard to the circumstances existing at the time when it was entered upon, and there were then five mortgagors alive.

The learned District Judge mentions that the first mortgage-deed stipulated that money might be borrowed up to the full value of the land. I can find no such stipulation in the document, which merely states "in accordance with my own necessity and in accordance with the capacity of the said property I have taken the zarpeshgi amount."

For the reasons given above, I find that the appellants are entitled to redeem the mortgage of 1269 F. S. and to recover possession of the entire 26 bighas on payment to the respondents of the sum of Rs. 200.

There is no evidence before this Court that the appellants have entered into any transaction with respect to this property with any person other than the respondents so that the stipulation as to payment of interest on Rs. 100 need not be observed.

I would, therefore, allow the appeal and set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court. The appellants will deposit the sum of Rs. 200, or so much of that sum as has not already been deposited by them, and redeem their land within six months. In default their suit will stand dismissed with costs.

The appellants will get costs in all three Courts.

COUTTS, J.—I agree.

A share in an under-proprietary tenure in a permanently settled village is a definite share of the estate as a whole, and the Court-fee payable on a suit for possession of such share is on ten times the revenue payable on the share in suit. [p. 133, col. 2.]

Appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Gonda, dated the 11th July 1919.

Mr. S. N. Roy, for the Appellant.

Babu Bisheshwar Nath Srivastava, for Respondents Nos. 1 to 4.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff brought the suit out of which this appeal arises for possession of a 5 annas, 4-pies share in the village Zorawarpur, Pargana Balrampur, District Gonda. He valued the land, which was the subject-matter of the suit, at Rs. 2,000 and paid an ad valorem Court-fee of Rs. 125 on that amount. Among other pleas, the defendants raised an objection as to the sufficiency of the Court fee paid by the plaintiff. The learned Subordinate Judge, with a view to enquire into the market value of the property, deputed a Commissioner to make investigations on the spot and to submit his report on that point to the Court. The Commissioner accordingly reported that the market-value of the property in suit was Rs. 8,500. The learned Subordinate Judge accepted the conclusion arrived at by the Commissioner and directed the plaintiff to pay Court-fee on that amount. After having deducted the Court-fee already paid by the plaintiff on his plaint, he ordered him to make good the deficiency of Rs. 290 till the 11th July 1919. The plaintiff failed to comply with the order and the learned Subordinate Judge under the provisions of section 10 of the Court Fees Act dismissed the suit. The plaintiff has now appealed to this Court.

It is contended by the learned Pleader on his behalf that the Court-fee already paid by him was far in excess of the Court fee which he was bound in law to pay. His contention is that the case falls either under Part 1 of clause (a) or under clause (c), and not under clause (d) of sub-section V, section 7, of the Court Fees Act (VII of 1870).

The whole of this village forms an under-proprietary tenure, one third of which is claimed by the plaintiff in this suit, and it is a permanently settled village with the Maharaja of Balrampur. The question is whether the land, which is the subject-matter of this suit, is a definite share of an estate paying annual revenue to Government. It is true that what is required as a test for the application of this part of clause (a) of sub-section V is not that the land in suit or the definite share in dispute should be liable to pay annual revenue to Government but that it is the estate of which the land in suit forms a part or a definite share that should have a liability to pay the revenue. It is common ground that the village as a whole pays annual revenue to Government though the person liable for that revenue is the superior proprietor, the Maharaja of Balrampur, and not the body of under proprietors owning the village as such: but that who pays the revenue to Government is wholly immaterial for the purpose of determining the Court fee payable on such a claim. As noted above, the 5-annas, 4 pies share which is the subject-matter of this suit is certainly a definite share of the estate as a whole which pays annual revenue to Government and as such revenue is permanently settled it follows that the amount of Court-fee payable by the plaintiff in this suit must be calculated with reference to ten times the revenue so payable. I took time to consider my judgment because I was anxious that my ruling on this point should not clash with any well-established practice in this behalf, but I am satisfied that there is no such uniform practice prevailing either in the Courts below or in this Court. It is also obvious that the point will not attract attention at all unless an objection to the amount paid by a plaintiff or an appellant on his plaint or memorandum of appeal, as the case may be, is raised either by the Taxing Officer or by any of the opposite parties. No such objection seems to have been raised in any of the cases that I have been told of. The learned Counsel, who appear for the parties before me, were also unable to refer to any decision of this Court on the point under consideration. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that at any rate in this particular case, the Court-fee payable by the plaintiff in the Court below as well as on his memorandum of appeal in this Court should have been on ten times the Government revenue. It is admitted that the annual revenue payable to the Government with regard to the whole of the village by the superior proprietor is Rs. 64 4-0, one third of which is equal to Rs. 21-8-0 as referable to the share in suit. Ten times of this amount gives us a total of Rs. 215. The plaintiff, therefore, paid much more than he was liable to pay. In the view of law which I have taken I am supported by a decision of a Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Hubibul Hossein v. Mahomed Reza (1).

The appeal is, therefore, allowed, the decree of the Court below set aside and, as the decision of the lower Court proceeded on a preliminary ground, the case is sent back to that Court for disposal according to law. The appellant will be entitled to his costs of this appeal from the respondent.

Civil revision against the order of the Subordinate Judge, Badaun, dated the 25th June 1919.

Mr. S. A. Haidar, for the Applicants.

Mr. Lakshmi Narain, for the Opposite Parties.

JUDGMENT.

PIGGOTT, J.—This is an application in revision against an order permitting a plaintiff to withdraw from a suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit. It is impossible to distinguish this case on the facts from the decision of a Bench of this Court in the case of Jhunku Lal v. Bisheshar Das (1), except that the present is a stronger case in favour of permission to withdraw being granted than was the one then under the consideration of this Court. We have been asked to reconsider the decision above referred to on the strength of a number of other reported cases. In particular, our attention has been drawn to four cases of this Court, three of them decided by learned Judges sitting singly and one by a Bench of two Judges. The facts in almost every case could be more or less distinguished, but the net result is that two learned Judges of this Court, either sitting singly or sitting together, have on occasions exercised the revisional jurisdiction of this Court in a manner which it would not be easy to reconcile with the principles laid down in Jhunku Lal v. Bisheshar Das (1). We think that this case was correctly decided and do not feel disposed to re-consider it. This application, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs, including fees on the higher scale.

WALSH, J.—I merely wish to add that I am satisfied I should have made the order that the learned Judge has made.

Under section 50 of the Succession Act it is sufficient for a valid attestation of a Will that the witnesses had a clear view of the testator when he was in the act of signing: it is not necessary for a witness to actually see the fingers of the testator move as the signature is made. [p. 138, col. 2.]

Inasmuch as initials operate as a signature, the mere fact that a testator affixes only his initials to a Will would not render the Will invalid if there is a proper attestation of the initials. [p. 139, col. 1.]

The mere fact that a Will contains pious reflections as to the authority of the Deity in worldly affairs and the submission of the creature, would not render the effect of the Will invalid. [p. 138, col. 2.]

Appeal from the decree of the Second Additional District Judge, Lucknow, dated the 23rd December 1918.

Pandit Jagmohan Nath Chak, for the Appellants.

Messrs. W. Wallach, Mohammad Nasim and N. N. Ghoshal, for Respondent No. 1.

JUDGMENT.—Raja Muhammad Siddik Khan, Talukdar of the Nanpara Taluka, in the Bahraich District, an estate worth over two crores of rupees, with an annual income of over Rs. 8,00,000, executed a Will in Bombay in January 1906. He died in Mecca on 30th December 1907. He had married in the following order Rani Kamar Zamani, Rani Saltanat, Rani Dilafza, and Rani Champa. He had gone through the ceremony of marriage with Rani Nasim Sahri, after he married Rani Champa. He could not marry legally more than four wives under his personal law. He asserted that before his marriage with Nasim Sahri had taken place he had divorced Rani Kamar Zamani. Dilafza, Champa, and Nasim Sahri were maid servants in the zenana before their marriages. He left no children at his death. He was survived by the five ladies above-mentioned and his sisters the Rani of Utraula and the Rani of Muhamdi.

Under the Will, the estate was left to Rani Nasim Sahri for life with power to adopt, and then to Rani Saltanat with power to adopt. Rani Nasim Sahri forfeited her rights under the Will by marrying a brother of Rani Saltanat in May 1908.

At the time of the Raja's death, the estate was under the management of the Court of Wards. The Court of Wards instituted an inter-pleader suit that the Court might determine succession to the estate. In this suit,

Rani Kamar Zamani claimed the estate denying the divorce, and contesting the Will:

Rani Saltanat claimed the estate under the Will:

Rani Dilafza claimed maintenance and dower under the Will:

Rani Champa claimed maintenance and dower under the Will:

Rani Nasim Sahri accepted the Will and admitted that she had forfeited her rights, therefore, by her re-marriage. She claimed dower only:

The Rani of Utraula asserted Rani Kamar Zamani's divorce, contested the Will, and contested the marriages of Ranis Saltanat, Dilafza, Champa and Nasim Sahri. She claimed the estate under the provisions of clause 11, section 22, Act I of 1869.

Three other persons put in claims which were dismissed on merits.

While proceedings were pending in the trial Court, Rani Saltanat adopted Saadat Ali Khan, minor son of the Rani of Muhamdi, and nephew of the deceased. Rani Kamar Zamani and the Rani of Utraula then compromised, and contest ceased between them and Rani Saltanat. It was agreed by this compromise that proprietary title in certain villages in the estate should be given to Rani Kamar Zamani, and the Ranis of Muhamdi and Utraula; that certain annuities should be paid to the Rajas of Muhamdi and Utraula and Rani Kamar Zamani; that the Ranis of Muhamdi and Utraula should enjoy life-interests, and that the estate should eventually pass to Saadat Ali Khan. Contest proceeded. The trial Judge decided that the Will was genuine, but that claims and allowances under the terms of the Will could not be decreed in the inter-pleader suit; that claims for dower could not be decreed in the inter pleader suit; that Rani Saltanat Begam was the ahle biradari wife of Raja Muhammad Siddik Khan but that she had lost all right of succession to the taluka after the adoption of Saadat Ali Khan, and that the marriages of Dilafza, Champa, and Nasim Sahri were not established. He dismissed the remaining claims and passed a decree according to the terms of the compromise. Against that decision Rani Saltanat, Rani Dilafza, and Rani Nasim Sahri, amongst others, appealed. These three ladies subsequently withdrew their appeals under the terms of a compromise made between them on the one side, and Rani Kamar Zamani, the Ranis of Muhamdi and Utraula, and Saadat Ali Khan on the other side. In the subsequent appeal this Court varied the decision of the trial Judge only on the question of the marriages of Ranis Dilafza, Champa, and Nasim Sahri. Since this Court's decision of 28th May 1914 the Court of Wards has been managing the estate on behalf of Rani Kamar Zamani, Saadat Ali Khan, and the other beneficiaries under the decree. The notification taking the Nanpara estate under the Court of Wards appeared in the United Provinces Gazette of 20th June 1914, and the notification under section 17, Court of Wards Act, Local Act IV of 1912, appeared in the United Provinces Gazette of 27th June 1914.

The following suits were put in subsequently against the Court of Wards, as manager of the estates, its wards being Rani Kamar Zamani, Saadat Ali Khan and the other beneficiaries:—

(1). A suit by Musammat Mehdi Begam, mother of Rani Saltanat, for arrears of annuity alleged to be payable to her under the provisions of the Will.

(2). A suit by Musammat Ketki, sister of Rani Champa, for arrears of annuity alleged to be payable to her under the provisions of the Will.

The suits were tried and dismissed by the learned Additional District Judge of Lucknow. Appeal No. 18 of 1919 has been filed against the dismissal of the first suit. Appeal No. 21 of 1919 has been filed against the dismissal of the second suit. The Court of Wards in both suits admitted that the Will, as executed on 8th January 1905, was a good Will. It agreed with the plaintiffs that it was duly executed and attested by the testator who was of sound disposing mind, but it asserted that out of the annuities claimed in the suits only an annuity to Mehdi Begam of Rs. 200 a month was authorized in the Will as executed and attested, and that she was estopped from claiming anything under that annuity.

To understand the nature of the contest in both suits it is necessary to examine the circumstances in which the Will came to be prepared.

Raja Muhammad Siddik Khan, at the time of the execution of the Will was living in Bombay with Ranis Saltanat, Dilafza, Champa, and Nasim Sabri. He had no children. He had separated from Rani Kamar Zamani, with whom he had had a violent quarrel. He believed that he had divorced her validly. It is immaterial whether he had good grounds for this belief. It is agreed that this was his belief. He had devoted much thought and care to the preparation of a Will, by which he would disinherit Rani Kamar Zamani and devise his property according to his own desires. He had engaged Mr. Abdul Rauf, Barrister-at-law, to draft this Will, retaining this gentleman in Bombay and paying him fees to devote his whole time to his service. The consultations between the Raja and Mr. Rauf were kept secret. The position was as follows. Rani Saltanat was a lady of good family and the senior then in the zenana. Rani Nasim Sabri was an ex maid servant of no family, and the junior in the zenana. The Raja for reasons which are not very clear on the record, made up his mind deliberately to prefer Nasim Sabri. He naturally wished to keep his decision quiet. So he instructed Mr. Abdul Rauf to employ a man unconnected with his household to draft the body of the Will. Mr. Rauf took a man called Anwaruddin for the purpose.

The Will consists of the body and four lists. The succession to the taluka is laid down in the body. The ninth clause declares that certain property has been set aside in order that its profits may provide a fund for the payment of annuities to the Raja's mother, Ranis Saltanat, Dilafza, and Champa, and certain relatives and servants whose names were to be added in a list to be attached called List No. 4.

It would have been better if the names of these annuitants had been entered in the body of the Will. It was, however, clearly the Raja's intention that the names should be placed in the list, and he was able by so doing to add to the names later. It is agreed that the Raja was a masterful man who brooked little or no interference with his plans and views even from a trusted legal adviser and that, although of sound disposing mind, he was eccentric and lavish with his money.

Those lists are as follows:—

List No. 1 is a list of all the landed property, other than house property, in the taluka.

List No. 2 is a list of the property the profits of which were set aside to pay the annuities.

List No. 3 is a list of house property.

List No. 4 contains the names of annuitants and the amounts of annuities.

There was nothing in the contents of List No. 4 which could reveal the testator's intentions, and only one entry in List No. 4 out of those which were not subsequently written with the Raja's own hand would reveal to a person who had not seen clause 9 that the amounts were annuities and not legacies. The use of the word

"salary" in the twenty first entry might have connoted the idea of an annuity to an astute reader. Such a reader would not, however, have been in a position to know whether the amount was payable annually or monthly. Thus, there is nothing requiring secrecy in the first three lists, and very little in the fourth.

According to both sides in both appeals, the body of the Will (with the exception of certain blanks), the first three lists, and the portion of the fourth list down to the twenty-first entry were faired out and ready on the 8th January 1906. On that day the Raja was in his rented residence in Bombay. Mr. Rauf and three attesting witnesses, Dr. Chowksey, Mr. Jussawala, and Captain D'armid, of the Mercantile Marine, were present. A Sub-Registrar arrived. It was intended, on completion of the Will, to place it in a sealed cover and deposit it with the Sub-Registrar. The Raja, however, took so much time in filling up the blanks that the Sub Registrar went away. After he had gone, the Will was initialled by the Raja and attested by the witnesses. Lists Nos. 1, 2, 3 were initialled by the Raja, and attested by the witnesses on the first page of each list. List No. 4 was initialled by the Raja and attested by the witnesses at the bottom of the first page (the thirty-third page of the document) underneath entry No, 21. Amongst the first twenty-one entries an annuity of Rs. 200 was allotted to Musammat Mehdi Begam. Nothing more was done that day. So far, both sides agree in both appeals. All the above facts are not brought out as clearly as they might be on the evidence on the record of the two suits, but the parties agree that these are the facts. This Bench, having heard the appeal in the inter-pleader suit in which the same facts were brought out in great detail, was in a favourable position to appreciate the points.

The first point in dispute is this. Musammat Ketki's Counsel urges that the next ten entries (which include Musammat Ketki's name) on List No. 4 were on the list when the Will was signed and attested on 8th January 1906. The trial Judge has found that they were not then there but subsequently added between the time of signature and attestation and the 23rd January 1906.

On that date the Raja, Mr. Rauf, Dr. Chowksey, and Mr. Jussawala again assembled in the Raja's rented house in Bombay. The Sub-Registrar was again sent for. The evidence here is quite clear and there is no contest as to what happened. The Raja sat at a table at some distance from Mr. Rauf, the Sub Registrar, and the attesting witnesses. He took the Will and proceeded to write upon it. A blank page had been left after his initials and the signatures of the attesting witnesses at page 11 and about two-thirds of a blank page had been left on the thirty-fourth page which was the second page of List No. 4. The Raja wrote on both pages. We shall consider subsequently what he wrote on the twelfth page. On the thirty-fourth page he wrote out the names of other annuitants in his own hand. The attesting witnesses were in a place where they could see the Raja writing. They could not see what he was writing and they were not in a position to see whether he initialled his additions or corrections. When he had completed what he was doing he sent for the attesting witnesses. He put a piece of blotting paper over what he had written on the thirty fourth page and they attested on the margin. They did not see what he had written on the twelfth page. They attested there also. The Will was then placed in a sealed cover and handed over to the Sub-Registrar for safe deposit. When it was subsequently opened it was discovered that the Raja had initialled on the twelfth page but had omitted to initial on the thirty-fourth page, although he had altered an item of Rs. 300 to Rs. 400 in one place on the thirty-fourth page and initialled the correction. It is argued on behalf of the Court of Wards, that there was no execution and attestation as provided for by law on the 23rd January 1906 and that the omission by the Raja to initial the thirty-fourth page, in any circumstances, deprives all bequests made in his own hand-writing of validity.

We shall now consider what he wrote on the twelfth page A correct translation of what he wrote on that page is as follows:—

SHER MUHAMMAD KHAN v. DEPUTY COMMISSIONER, BAHRAICH.

"May God protect me from Satan! I commence in the name of God who is most merciful and most compassionate.

"God's will must always be done through the grace of God!

"Every man looks to his own interest whoever he may be. It is hoped that the Presence (i. e., God) will look with favourable patronage upon the deed of inheritance which has been executed and registered." (It was placed in a sealed cover for safe custody. But under the provisions of Act I of 1869 the effect of placing such a Will with a Sub-Registrar for safe custody is the same as the effect of registration. Of course, the Will had not at the time that the words were written been placed in a sealed cover for safe custody but this was done directly afterwards.)

"On account of the desire that is to say the restless anxiety which a man of religion necessarily feels it is essential in this and substantial world that communion with the Prophet should be an accomplished fact in lifetime." (It is very difficult to translate these words. The Raja was admittedly a man who had a strong religious element in his character which was undoubtedly genuine though his conduct was not always all that should have been desired. He was a man of very little education and had no claims to be a clear writer. Most of this may be taken as an expression of religious devotion on the part of a not well-educated man.) "The life of man is divided into four parts" (Some diagrams were drawn after this.) "I think that on account of the press of mundane matters I have not been able to enter most important matters. But the remembrance of God is most important. The greatest reliance should be placed on God. So far as was in my power I executed this Will in favour of the Ranis who have been faithful to me." (This is a clear indication of the difference of treatment between Rani Kamar Zamani and Ranis Saltanat, Dilafza, Champa, and Nasim Sahri.) "I shall pass my life in prayer to God, the perusal of the Holy Kuran, pilgrimages to sacred places, and walking in the paths of Holy men—desires which I have always cherished. God is omnipresent and everything else is transitory. I shall perform all the duties which devolve on me as a man with pleasure and consent. I shall supervise these duties honestly. I have always relied upon the Government to which I am religiously inclined. I have been vigilant to bear no ill-will against my enemies who wish to harm me and disgrace me. I am thankful to the Holy God who has been so good to me. Amen, Amen, Amen. From the present moment to and after death I expect to be face to face with God who is imperishable. I pray with folded hands. May God protect me!"

He then affixed his initials and added—

"My last salutation with folded hands to the Government may be accepted."

He then initialled again.

Now what is the effect of this? The learned Counsel for the Court of Wards has argued that all this means nothing and that it contains no more than pious expressions of a mind which, though admitted to be a good disposing mind, was the mind of an eccentric man and nothing more. But this is not the view that we would take. While admitting that the religious exordium was hardly necessary in a testamentary document, we do not lose sight of the fact that amongst Muhammadans, especially Muhammadans of a religious turn of mind as the Raja certainly was, it is frequently thought only becoming and right to introduce pious reflections, containing clear statements as to the authority of the Deity in worldly affairs and the submission of the creature, into testamentary documents. So, we do not consider that the many pious expressions in any way invalidate the effect, and the effect appears to us to be this. Although the Will, so far as it was in existence, had been duly executed and attested on the 8th January 1906, there still remained under the testator's desires certain additions to be made. Those additions were not made in the body of the Will but were made in List No. 4. Having made these additions the Raja felt that a peroration was necessary and in this peroration he states distinctly that this is his last Will and testament and that he wishes that God may look favourably upon him. He states his main reason for making the Will—the desire to benefit those ladies who were his wives and who had been faithful to him. He explains that his future attitude towards life would be one of religious devotion although he does not wish to neglect his temporal affairs.

We look upon this as in the testator's opinion the final execution of the Will. In the previous judgment in the inter-pleader suit it was stated, when stating the facts, that the Will had been executed on the 8th January 1906. But the point did not then arise as to when it had been executed and was not material to the case. After examining the matter more closely we are of opinion that the Will was executed on the 23rd January 1906 provided that the signature and the attestation are correct. Now there can be no doubt as to the fact that the initials at page 12 are the initials of the Raja, and initials operate as a signature. The learned Counsel for the Court of Wards has argued that there was no sufficient execution or attestation under the provisions of section 50 of Act X of 1865. Unless the provisions of this section are complied with, the Will will not be a good Will under the provisions of Act I of 1869 so as to affect talukdari property. The section lays down that the testator shall sign or affix his mark to the Will, or that it shall be signed by some other person in his presence and by his direction. There can be no doubt as to the fact that the Raja affixed his initials to the Will on the 23rd January 1906. It next lays down that the signature or mark of the testator, or the signature of the person signing for him, shall be so placed that it shall appear that it was intended thereby to give effect to the writing as a Will. Here the learned Counsel for the Court of Wards argues that this last passage has nothing to do with giving effect to the writing as a Will. We consider that it does so. It emphasizes the fact that this is the testator's Will and it introduces one new element that it is proposed to register the Will. The section continues that the Will shall be attested by two or more witnesses, each of whom must have seen the testator sign or affix his mark to the Will, or have seen some other person sign the Will, in the presence and by the direction of the testator, or have received from the testator a personal acknowledgment of his signature or mark, or of the signature of such other person, and each of the witnesses must sign the Will in the persence of the testator but it shall not be necessary that more than one witness be present at the same time, and no particular form of attestation shall be necessary. The first point that arises is—Did Dr. Chowksey and Mr. Jussawala see the Raja affix his initials? The evidence is quite clear on the point. They were in the same room. From a little distance they saw him in the act of writing. At the distance that they were, it was impossible for them to see whether he did or did not affix his initials at that time while he was in the act of writing. But, on the evidence as a whole, there can be no doubt to our minds that they saw him writing, that at the time of writing he signed by placing his initials upon the document and that they saw him while he was doing this. We, therefore, find that they saw him sign the Will. The learned Counsel for the Court of Wards has referred us to the decision in Brown v. Skirrow (1), in which Gorell Barnes, J., found that where a testatrix signed her Will in a shop, and one witness, who saw her sign, attested it, but the other witness being, at the time when the testatrix and first witness signed, engaged at the other side of the shop with a person who stood between him and the testatrix, did not see them sign and did not know nor have the opportunity of knowing any thing about what they had been engaged upon until after they had signed when he was asked to be a witness, the testatrix did not sign in the presence of the second witness. The learned Judge did not appear to have approached this decision without some difficulty, but, in any circumstances, it would not affect the present case. The ratio decidendi there was that as some person was between the testatrix and the second witness, the second witness saw nothing. But here the witnesses had an unimpeded field of vision. It cannot, we think, be laid down, under the provisions of the Indian Succession Act, that it is necessary for a witness to actually see the fingers move as the signature is made. It is only necessary to satisfy ourselves that the witnesses had a clear view of the testator when he was in the act of signing. They certainly had this here and as there can be no possible doubt to our minds as to the fact that the Raja did on the 23rd January 1906 sign this document while Mr. Jussawala and

Dr. Choksey were in the same room with him with an unimpeded field of vision and as they both signed the Will as attesting witnesses in his presence, we find that the Will was executed not on the 8th January 1906 but on the 23rd January 1906 according to law. The absence of the testator's signature at the end of List No. 4 is not, in our opinion, material. We agree with the learned trial Judge that the initials on the correction of three to four cannot operate as the signature of the list. But we do not consider that it was necessary for the testator to sign the list at all or for the attesting witnesses to attest it. The signature and attestation to which we have already adverted cover everything in the Will, provided that we are satisfied that the entries in dispute were made with the knowledge and according to the wishes of the testator. These entries are two—one is the entry of Rs. 500 monthly allowance to Musammat Ketki which, as we have found, was written by the hand of Ahmad Zaki and the other is an entry of a monthly allowance of Rs. 500 to Musammat Mehdi Begam which was written with the Raja's own hand. With reference to the first entry, we are satisfied that it was made at the Raja's desire. Mr. Abdul Rauf was in his confidence. Mr. Abdul Rauf gave the list to Ahmad Zaki to copy. Musammat Ketki has deposed, and we see no reason to disbelieve her, that the Raja had told her about the time that the Will was executed that he was making provision for her therein. He had the entry in front of him at the time that he was making the subsequent entries in his own hand. In these circumstances, we find that the entry was made to his knowledge and with his consent. With regard to the second entry it is admitted by the learned Counsel for the Court of Wards that as the entry is in the Raja's own handwriting he cannot suggest that it was not made at his wish.

The next point that we have to consider in this appeal is, how we are to interpret the first and second entry in favour of Musammat Mehdi Begam. In the list which was admittedly prepared before the signature and attestation of the 8th January 1906 she was given a monthly allowance of Rs. 200. Subsequently, the Raja added a monthly allowance of Rs. 500 in his own handwriting. It has been argued that the allowance of Rs. 200 is to be absorbed in the allowance of Rs. 500. We cannot accept this contention. We find that with regard to Mehdi Begam's sons, Rani Saltanat's brothers, the Raja crossed out entries giving them smaller amounts and substituted larger amounts. If he had wished to give Mehdi Begam an allowance of Rs. 500 only and cut out the allowance of Rs. 200 we should have expected him to cross out the entry of Rs. 200 and initial the correction. There is nothing unlikely in his wishing to give Rani Saltanat's mother as much as Rs. 700 a month. He was lavish with his money. Rani Saltanat's mother would be a suitable object for his generosity. We, therefore, decide that under the Will Musammat Mehdi Begam was entitled to Rs. 700 a month.

We now come to the last point in the appeal—the question of estoppel. Here the evidence is absolutely conflicting. According to Rani Saltanat and Musammat Mehdi Begam, since deceased, who were both called as witnesses, Musammat Mehdi Begam cannot be estopped in any way by anything that subsequently happened. Rani Saltanat says that after she adopted Saadat Ali Khan she was left in a position of defending her rights to her maintenance under the Will fixed at Rs. 4,000 a month and to her dower in respect of which she had claimed Rs. 3,00,000. She also was not satisfied with the justice of the decision which declared that by adoption of Saadat Ali Khan she forfeited a life-interest in the estate and she had filed an appeal to secure the relief to which she felt herself entitled and was proceeding with it before the Court of the Judicial Commissioner. She had parted with much of her claim in favour of a certain Agha Sheikh Kazim, a resident of Kazmain in Mesopotamia. This man who is a man of some property had acquired interests in the claims of Rani Saltanat, Rani Dilafza, and Rani Nasim Sahri. These claims are to some extent conflicting. But whatever may have been the case in respect of that matter, the conduct of the litigation had passed into the hands of Agha Sheikh Kazim. These claims, as has already been mentioned, were eventually compromised, and it is with regard to what happened in that compromise that the plea of estoppel has arisen. There are two absolutely conflicting stories. The story put forward by

Musammat Mehdi Begam, her daughter, and Agha Sheikh Kazim is as follows :—They say that they were persuaded to approach the other party, which consisted of Rani Kamar Zamani and the Ranis of Muhamdi and Utraula, with a view to a settlement. The settlement was to be arranged under the advice of the late Sir Duncan Baillie, who was then a member of the Board of Revenue in charge of the Court of Wards for the Province. Their story is that Rani Saltanat insisted on receiving as generous treatment as Rani Kamar Zamani, that she was determined to have her claim for dower met generously, her personal property handed over to her, and her allowance raised from Rs. 4,000 a month, the amount due under the Will, to Rs. 6,500, but that she had no objection to a portion of the Rs. 6,500 being settled on her own relatives, that in the subsequent compromise all the benefits went to her, but that she of her own free will assigned portions of the benefits to her own relatives. That is the case put forward by the appellants. The case put forward on the other side is that the compromise effected between Rani Saltanat on the one side and Rani Kamar Zamani and the Ranis of Muhamdi and Utraula on the other side not only included her claims but included the claims of her mother, brothers, and certain other persons, and that her mother and brothers, though they did not enter into the compromise, agreed to be bound by the results. The principal witness in support of this story is Khan Bahadur Saiyid Muhammad Mustafa, who was then manager of the estate under the Court of Wards. He had previously been manager under Raja Muhammad Siddik and for a period had been assistant manager under an English manager of the Court of Wards, eventually becoming manager of the estate. The learned trial Judge believed his evidence and did not believe the evidence on the other side. According to him, this was what happened. Under the Will, Rani Saltanat received Rs. 4,000 a month. Rani Nasim Sahri received a life-interest in the whole estate but she forfeited all rights under the Will by her remarriage. Musammat Mehdi Begam was, according to the Court of Wards to receive only Rs. 500 a month for they refused to recognise both annuities. Rani Saltanat's two brothers were to receive Rs. 400 a month each under the Will. Sher Muhammad Khan, a third brother, was to receive nothing. Hashmat Jahan, a daughter's daughter of Musammat Mehdi Begam, was to receive nothing and Tahira, Sher Muhammad Khan's daughter, was to receive nothing. In addition, there were the ladies' claims to dower. Now, the action of Rani Kamar Zamani and the Ranis of Muhamdi and Utraula which cannot be taken as the action of the late Sir Duncan Baillie (we do not even know that he approved of it) was to treat the beneficiaries under the Will as persons who might be got to reduce their claims if pressure was put upon them. They were rather inclined to take up the position that, if these annuitants wanted to contest the matter they were ready to meet them, and that they were not likely to give them all that the Will allowed. In the case of Rani Kamar Zamani this attitude was less unjustifiable as she had all along denied the validity of the Will and was ready to challenge its provisions. In the case of the Rani of Utraula who had also contested the validity of the Will the position was the same. But, in the case of the Rani of Muhamdi, who had accepted the Will and accepted Rani Saltanat's adoption of her own son under the Will with a view to his eventual succession to the estate, the position does not seem justifiable. However, this was the position. There appears to be no doubt as to the fact that Rani Saltanat, though she was a lady of position, and her relatives were treated rather as adventurers, who were lucky to get what they could and that Dilafza and Nasim Sahri were treated as fortunate domestics who were lucky to get anything. But this is the manner in which the compromise was conducted and the compromise eventually arrived at was a very peculiar one. According to Khan Bahadur Saiyid Muhammad Mustafa, the brothers of Rani Saltanat were told that, though under the Will they were allowed annuities of Rs. 400 each, the other side would not grant them more than Rs. 200 each, and they accepted this position. Musammat Mehdi Begam was told that all she would get would be Rs. 500. She accepted that position. They apparently were ready then to accept the fact that the Raja had intended to leave her at least Rs. 500 a month. It was then put to Rani Saltanat that she would get Rs. 4,000 a month, to Dilafza that she would get Rs. 950 and to Musammat Mehdi Begam that she would get Rs 500. This was the amount to which they held Musammat Mehdi Begam was entitled under the Will. Mehdi Begam's two sons were to get Rs. 200 each. The third son Sher Muhammad Khan who got nothing under the Will was to get Rs. 40. Mubarak Jahan Begam, Mehdi Begam's daughter, was to get Rs. 50. Bela, Ketki's sister, who was put down to get Rs. 5 0, was to get Rs. 50 and a servant girl called Munga who was to get Rs. 100 under the Will was to get Rs. 10. Nasim Sahri was to get no annuity at all. She had lost all her rights under the Will. Those conditions were summarised on a memo. which was signed by Sheikh Muhammad Kazim and Akbar Ali who represented Rani Kamar Zamani and the Rani of Muhamdi. Sheikh Muhammad Kazim was to get Rs. 300 a month and Sheikh Abdul Karim, his brother, was to get Rs. 200. On this basis the compromise was to be made. The amount of Rs. 6,500 thus made up did not concern Rani Saltanat, except with regard to Rs. 4,000. After subsequent discussion the figures were altered again. The final compromise under which the appeals of Ranis Saltanat, Dilafza, and Nasim Sahri were withdrawn is dated the 22nd August 1912. Under this compromise Rani Saltanat was to get an annuity of Rs. 4,000. Rani Dilafza was to get an annuity of Rs. 1,000. The annuities of the two sons, Nawab Muhammad Ata Khan and Nawab Muhammad Sultan Khan, were raised to Rs. 300. The annuity of Sher Muhammad Khan who got nothing under the Will was raised to Rs. 170. Mubarak Jahan's annuity remained the same. Munga's remained the same. Sheikh Muhammad Kazim's annuity was reduced to Rs. 250. Abdul Karim's remained Rs. 200. Two new annuities were added—one to Hashmat Jahan, Mubarak Jahan's daughter, of Rs. 30, and the other of Rs. 30 to Tahira, daughter of Sher Muhammad Khan. Mehdi Begam's was reduced to Rs. 110. The story told by Khan Bahadur Saiyid Muhammad Mustafa is as follows: According to the story told by him Mehdi Begam personally agreed to this. She said according to him, that she was ready to put her total claim at Rs. 500 a month only of which she was content to take only Rs. 110 for herself provided that Muhammad Ata Khan and Muhammad Sultan Khan's shares were raised by Rs. 100 each, Sher Muhammad Khan's share raised from Rs. 40 to Rs. 170 and two annuites of Rs. 30 settled on her grand-daughters, thus making up Rs. 500. If she agreed to this arrangement it would undoubtedly be binding on her for the following reasons. Her acquiescence has caused the other side to continue paying Rs. 390 a month to other persons which they otherwise would not have been paying. She was an elderly lady (she has since died) whose annuity in the ordinary course of events would have terminated before the annuities of her juniors. By making this arrangement the other side undertook to pay annuities to younger people. A grave omission was the failure to get Mehdi Begam and most of the other persons affected to sign the compromise. Khan Bahadur Saiyid Muhammad Mustafa has, however, deposed that the difficulty which arose was this. The compromise was filed in a suit. According to the views taken by the Counsel no one could sign the compromise who was not a party to the suit. Mehdi Begam was, of course, not a party to the suit. Further, there was some difficulty in introducing a reference to the Will as Rani Kamar Zamani and the Rani of Utraula refused to recognise the Will. Nevertheless, it was a distinct omission not to obtain from Mehdi Begam and the other parties who were not actually parties to the compromise the withdrawal of all claims on the conditions laid down. The compromise had further settled the claims to dower. Under it, Rani Saltanat got Rs. 1,87,500, Rani Dilafza Rs. 50,000, Rani Nasim Sahri Rs. 25,000 and Sheikh Muhammad Kasim as their financier received Rs. 18,75,000. Against the story of the appellants is its inconsistency. Rani Saltanat has adhered to the statement that she wanted Rs. 6,500 a month for herself taking Rs. 2,500 a month in lieu of her abandonment of the claim for the balance of her dower and other reliefs, and she would have us believe that, receiving that amount, she entered into the compromise. In the first place, it is not clear that she abandoned any claim to dower to speak of. She had only claimed Rs. 3,00,000, had received Rs. 1,87,500 and the proportion received by her financier practically made up the balance. Next, it is to be noted that under the compromise Dilafza received Rs. 1,000 a month. The claim of Rani Dilafza was a perfectly separate claim to Rani Saltanat's. The story told by the appellants on this point is inconsistent and inconclusive. All that we have to decide is, whether the learned trial Judge arrived at a right conclusion as to the credibility of the evidence. The two stories told are absolutely conflicting. We are faced with the position as to whether Khan Bahadur Saiyid Muhammad Mustafa is telling the truth or whether the witnesses on the other side are telling the truth. The learned trial Judge believed Khan Bahadur Saiyid Muhammad Mustafa and nothing has been elicited in the arguments before us to establish that he arrived at a wrong conclusion. Accepting Khan Bahadur Saiyid Muhammad Mustafa's evidence as true upon the point, we find that Musammat Mehdi Begam distinctly agreed to forego claims to anything more than Rs. 110 a month on the understanding that the other side should increase the amounts payable to persons in whom she was interested. We believe the evidence of Khan Bahadur Saiyid Muhammad Mustafa upon this point. We find that the other side have kept their bargain and that they have paid out the amounts in the manner in which Musammat Mehdi Begam desired. She is thus precluded from standing on her rights under the Will after the date of the compromise of the 22nd August 1912 which embodied the oral agreement at which she had arrived but to which she was not actually a party. We do not agree with the learned trial Judge that her claim should be dismissed as not falling within the terms of her plaint. The latter portion of her claim is distinctly one under the Will. All that her Counsel says in effect now is this,—"Under the Will I should be entitled to Rs. 700 a month. But if the Court decides against me that I am estopped from claiming more than Rs. 110 a month after the 22nd August 1912, I still claim that Rs. 110 a month under the Will and not on an independent cause of action. I do not claim under the agreement. The agreement merely modifies my rights under the Will." This is a reasonable view which must be accepted.

The result is as follows. We decree the appeal to this extent. The appellants, who are the successors of the deceased Musammat Mehdi Begam, are entitled in so far as they have interests in the estate of the deceased, (it is to be noted that Rani Saltanat who is one of Musammat Mehdi Begam's heirs is not a party to the appeal) to a relief based on the following calculations. At Rs. 700 a month from the date of the death of Raja Muhammad Siddik, i. e., the 31st December 1907, to the 21st August 1912 and from the 22nd August 1912 to the 13th February 1917 at Rs. 110 a month. As the Court of Wards have all along been ready to pay her Rs. 110 a month the appellants will receive interest only on the amount which accrued up to the 21st August 1912. Interest will be at the rate of six per cent. per annum. With regard to the question of costs, as the plaintiffs have partly succeeded and partly failed we direct that the parties will bear their own costs in both Courts.

LAHORE HIGH COURT.

MISCELLANEOUS SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 1095 OF 1919.

November 25, 1919.

Present:—Mr. Justice Broadway.

BHALLA AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—APPELLANTS

FAZAL MUHAMMAD AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS, HAYAT MUHAMMAD—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. III, rr. 1, 4, O. XX, rr. 2, 3—Date for pronouncing judgment—Notice to Counsel, whether sufficient—Judgment recorded and dated by predecessor of Court—Judgment pronounced second time by succeseor of Court, legality of—Jurisdiction.

A Court adjourned a case to the 25th March 1918 for the purpose of pronouncing judgment: on that date a decree for pre-emption was granted coupled with the condition that unless the requisite pre-emption-money was paid within one month the decree would become void. Payment was not made within the time fixed, but on the 7th June 1918 the decree-holder made a representation to the Court that he was not aware that judgment had been pronounced and asked for permission to pay the money; the officer who passed the decree having been transferred, his successor, while admitting that he had no power to extend the time for payment, came to the conclusion that judgment had not been pronounced on the 25th March 1918, although the record showed that on that date parties' Counsel were present, he accordingly, on the 2nd December 1918, proceeded to pronounce judgment, already signed and dated by his predecessor:

Held, that under Order III, rules 1 and 4 of the Civil Procedure Code notice to Counsel was sufficient, that there was no reason for holding that judgment had not been pronounced on the 25th March 1918, and that the Court acted without jurisdiction in pronouncing, for the second time, a judgment recorded and dated by his predecessor.

Miscellaneous second appeal from the order of the District Judge, Gurdaspur, dated the 22nd March 1919, affirming that of the Munsif, 2nd Class, Pathankot, District Gurdaspur, dated the 2nd December 1918.

Lala Mehar Chand Mahajan, for the Appellant.

Mr. Ghulam Rasul, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal has arisen out of a pre-emption suit in the following circumstances:—On the 20th February 1918, the parties closed their respective cases and an order was passed adjourning the case to the 27th February 1918 for arguments. On that date the record shows that Counsel for the parties were present and the case was adjourned to the 8th March 1918 for judgment, it being noted that Counsel would put in written arguments. On the 8th March 1918 the record shows that the Counsel for the parties were present and that the case was adjourned to the 25th March 1918 for judgment. Although it is not specifically stated in the order, the words employed indicate that by the 8th March 1918 the written arguments had been filed in. On the 25th March 1918 a decree for pre-emption of the land in suit was granted and a period of one month fixed within which the requisite money was to be deposited: and in default of such payment the decree was declared to be void. The money was not paid within a month from the date of the judgment; but on the 7th June 1918 the pre emptor decree-holder moved the successor of the learned Munsif who had passed the decree alleging that he had not been aware that the judgment had been pronounced and asking for permission to pay in the requisite money. Upon this, on the 2nd December 1918, the learned Munsif, while admitting that he had no power to extend the period fixed by the decree, came to the conclusion that the judgment had not been pronounced on the 25th March 1918 and proceeded to pronounce the judgment, already signed and dated on the 2nd December 1918. Against this order an appeal was preferred to the learned District Judge who upheld the order of the learned Munsif and held that the note by the Reader of the Court to the effect that the parties' Counsel were present was not sufficient to show that the judgment had been duly pronounced. The learned District Judge considered that, as far as Counsel were concerned, the case was over before the 25th March 1918 and that, therefore, there had been no proper pronouncement. Against this order on appeal the defendant has preferred this second appeal to this Court, throught Lala Mehr Chand, Mahajan, and I have heard Mr. Ghulam Rasul on behalf of the respondent.

In coming to his decision the learned District Judge has lost sight of Order III, rules 1 and 4, Civil Procedure Code, which clearly show that a notice to Counsel is sufficient. The note referred to by the learned District Judge as having been made by the Reader bears the signature of the presiding officer, and there is absolulely no reason for holding that judgment was not pronounced in the presence of Counsel. It has to be noted that the Counsel was not produced as a witness to rebut the presumption that exists as to the correctness of the record. In these circumstances, I consider that the decisions of the Courts below are incorrect. Farther, it seems to me that the learned Munsif who passed the order on the 2nd December 1918 acted without jurisdiction when he proceeded to pronounce a judgment recorded and dated by his predecessor for the second time, thus, practically, giving the pre emptor a further period within which to pay up the pre-emption money.

In these circumstances, I accept this appeal and set aside the orders of the Courts below. I leave the parties to bear their own costs in this Court.

Appeal accepted.

CRIMINAL APPLICATION FOR REVISION No. 417 OF 1919.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 372—Disposal of minor girl for purposes of prostitution—Gejjee ceremony, performance of—Offence.

The mere performance of what is known as the gejjee ceremony in respect of a minor girl does not amount to a disposal of the girl with the intent that she shall be employed or used for the purpose of prostitution, within the meaning of section 372 of the Penal Code. [p. 146, col. 1.]

Criminal application for revision of the order of the Sessions Judge, Kanara, confirming the order of conviction and sentence passed by the Magistrate, First Class, Kumta.

Mr. G. P. Murdeshwar, for the Accused.

Mr. S. S. Patkar, Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—The applicant before us has been convicted under section 372 of the Indian Penal Code for having disposed of her daughter Subbi under the age of 16 with intent that she shall be employed or used for the purpose of prostitution. The trial Court found that the ceremony described in the record as Gejjee ceremony was in fact performed in respect of the girl in question, and that the performance of that ceremony amounted to a disposal of the girl within the meaning of the section. The accused was accordingly convicted. In appeal the learned Sessions Judge has found that "a girl, who, upon the strength of the Gejjee ceremony alone, should begin to practise harlotry, would incur reprobation among her fellows, and would be put out of communion with the caste. Dedication to the life of a courtesan is not made by Gejjee Shastra but by Falshobhan, which is the wedding of the votaress and her god." It is further found by him that the girl in question has not become a prostitute and that it is not admitted that she is intended to become a prostitute. He apparently believed the evidence adduced to show that some of the girls who had gone through this ceremony, were married women. He felt, however, pressed with what he believed to be the effect of certain decided cases and confirmed the conviction and sentence.

In the application before us it has been argued on behalf of the applicant that on the findings there is no dedication of the girl which would amount to a disposal within the meaning of section 372 of the Indian Penal Code. It seems to me on the findings of the Appellate Court that this contention is well-founded. It may be that the performance of the Gejjee ceremony may ultimately facilitate the fall of this girl. But it is not a necessary consequence of the ceremony, according to the findings that she should be treated as a girl dedicated to a temple as a dancing girl. The decisions in Queen-Empress v. Tippa (1) and Reg. v. Jaili Bhavin (2) must be taken to have been based upon the proved or admitted facts in those cases. In both these cases there was undoubtedly the fact of the dedication of the girl to the temple. In the present case on the findings it cannot be said that the girl is dedicated to the temple. On the contrary on the findings of the Appellate Court it would appear that the ceremony described as the Falshobhan ceremoney would mark the stage when the girl is dedicated to the temple. The distinction which the Sessions Judge has drawn between the two stages marked by the performance of the Gejjee ceremony, and the Falshobhan ceremony is apparently based on the evidence in the case and must be accepted for the purpose of this application. In the case of Srinivasa v. Annasami (3) to which a reference has been made the facts were different. This case like the other two cases must be taken to have been decided with reference to the facts of the case. In the present case it seems to me that the position of the girl for all practical purposes with reference to her surroundings continued to be much the same after the ceremony as it was before. She continued to live with her mother, and it is not shown to be a necessary consequence of the performance of the ceremony that she should either leave her mother or that she cannot marry or that she must lead the life of a prostitute.

(2) 6 B. H. C. R. 60 Cr.
(3) 15 M. 41; 1 Weir 365; 5 Ind Dec. (N. S.) 378.

Under those circumstances the mere fact of the performance of the ceremony cannot be treated as amounting to a disposal within the meaning of section 372 of the girl by her mother. It must be distinctly understood that I have reached this conclusion on the facts found by the lower Appellate Court in this case.

I would make the Rule absolute, set aside the conviction and sentence and direct the fine, if paid, to be refunded.

The bail bonds to be cancelled.

HAYWARD, J.—I concur. The ceremony known as Gejjee Shastra that was performed has been held to have been merely preliminary and not the ceremony of dedication known as Falshobhan which has been held the final ceremony. The case differs, therefore, from the complete dedication to a temple which was proved in the cases of Reg. v. Jaili Bhavin (2) and Queen Empress v. Tippa (1). It seems to me, therefore, that there has been no disposal of the girl on the facts found by the learned Sessions Judge within the meaning of section 372 of the Indian Penal Code

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 208 OF 1920.
April 10, 1920.

MUNICIPAL BOARD, ETAWAH—
PETITIONER

OPPOSITE PARTY.

U. P. Municipalities Act (II of 1916), s. 267, notice under, contents of—Notice dealing with matters other than sanitation, whether valid—Disobedience of such notice, whether offence.

A notice under section 267 of the U. P. Municipalities Act, 1916, must be confined to the removal of insanitary defects. A notice under that section which complains of matters other than sanitation, e. g, a dangerous structure, or a nuisance in the sense of a danger on the highway, is not a good notice, and a disobedience of such a notice is not an offence. [p. 146, col. 2.]

Criminal revision against the order of the Magistrate, Etawah, dated the 30th October 1919.

Mr. P. N. Banerjee, for the Applicant.

JUDGMENT.—The Municipality in this case seem to me to have misconceived the position. I do not know why the District Magistrate thought it was a case of gross injustice. At the outside there had only been a fine of Rs. 10. It looks more like a case of misunderstanding. The Board issued a notice under section 267 of the Municipalities Act of 1916. Section 267 is a section contained in that part of the Act which empowers the Municipality to take such steps as are in their opinion necessary and of course, reasonable to protect the public against insanitary conditions. The notice may require an owner to close, remove, alter, repair, cleanse, disinfect or put in good order any latrine, drain, cesspool or other receptacle for carrying away or containing refuse. That section implies that the receptacle, whatever it may be, drain or cesspool is not in good order and not fit for the purpose, that is to say the sanitary purpose, for which it is required. Section 267 does not contemplate or deal with any objection which might be raised to the existence of a receptacle which is not based upon a sanitary ground, and the notice in specifying what is required to be provided must necessarily specify what it is which is defective in the existing receptacle. The Municipality in this case appreciated that necessity and stated in the notice what it was which was objectionable. The notice complains of a cesspool without a covering, into which passers-by are likely to fall at night. That is a sound objection but is not a sanitary objection. It really is an objection dealing with a dangerous structure or a nuisance in the sense of a source of danger upon the highway. The result is that the notice issued under section 267 is a bad notice, and the facts do not show that the receptacle was objectionable from a sanitary point of view. Therefore, the member of the public, Pandit Debi Prasad, has committed no offence in igonring it. The Magistrate says that section 263 applies. Section 263 enables the Board to require an owner by notice to protect or enclose any tank or reservoir or excavation in his possession, which appears to the Board to be dangerous by reason of its situation. That is the provision appropriate for an open cesspool into which people are likely to fall at night, and if the Municipality have any ground for taking action about this cesspool they must issue a notice under that section. But if it be the fact, as the Bench Magistrate has said in his original order, that it is not necessary to rebuild the cesspool, the Municipality ought to be content with the cover provided, so long as the protection placed over the opening of the cesspool does not in itself constitute a fresh danger. All that the Municipality have to see is that the covering is sufficiently strong and stable to make the passage of the public free from danger. I dismiss the application.

Oaths Act (X of 1873), ss. 9, 10, 11—Bombay Village Police Act (VIII of 1867), ss. 14, 15—Proceedings before Police Patil, nature of—Special oath, whether applicable to criminal proceedings.

Proceedings before a Police Patil under sections 14 and 15 of the Bombay Village Police Act are essentially criminal proceedings.

The scheme of sections 9 to 11 of the Oaths Act shows that these sections are not intended to apply to criminal proceedings.

In criminal matters the truth has to be ascertained by the Court, and the matter stated on special oath cannot be and ought not to be accepted as conclusively proved by such an oath in a criminal proceeding.

Criminal application for revision from conviction and sentence passed by the Police Patil, Dharangaon.

Mr. W. B. Pradhan, for the Accused.

Mr. S. S. Patkar, Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—This case has been decided by the Police Patil on the special oath of the complainant. The special oath was offered to the complainant at the instance of the accused and the decision is based on that oath. It has been held by this Court in Queen-Empress v. Murarji Gokuldas (1) that sections 9 to 11 of the Indian Oaths Act are not intended to apply to criminal proceedings. It is clear that the provisions of the Indian Oaths Act relating to the special oaths cannot properly apply to criminal proceedings. Section 11 of the Act provides that the evidence given on special oath as against the person who offered to be bound by it is conclusive proof of the matter stated. It seems to me that in criminal matters the truth has to be ascertained by the Court; and the matter stated on special oath cannot be and ought not to be accepted as conclusively proved by such an oath in a criminal proceeding. The scheme of these sections shows that they are not intended to apply to criminal proceedings.

It is urged, however, on behalf of the Crown that though that view may be right with reference to the criminal proceedings generally, it does not apply to proceedings before the Police Patil under the village Police Act (VIII of 1867). It seems to me that the proceedings before the Police Patil under sections 14 and 15 are essentially criminal proceedings; and the same rule which applies to criminal proceedings ought to apply on general grounds to proceedings before the village Patil so far as the effect of any special oath is concerned.

Generally speaking, we are very slow to interfere with any decision of a Police Patil. But having regard to the nature of the error in this case, I am of opinion that it would not be right to allow the decision to stand.

I would, therefore, make the Rule absolute and set aside the conviction and sentence.

HAYWARD, J.—I agree. The case was not properly tried. The provisions of sections 9 and 11 of the Indian Oaths Act, 1873, have in their nature no application to criminal proceedings, as indicated in the case of Queen-Empress v. Murarri Gokuldas (1).

Motor Vehicles Act (VIII of 1914), s. 8—Failure to produce license upon demand—"Upon demand," meaning of.

Under section 8 of the Motor Vehicles Act it is compulsory upon a driver of a motor vehicle to carry his license with him, and he is bound to produce it at once directly a Police Officer calls upon him to do so. Failure to produce a license immediately upon such demand is punishable under the section. [p 148, col. 2]

The words "upon demand" in section 8 of the Motor Vehicles Act mean at once directly the demand is made. [p. 48, col 2]

The Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadar Sapru, for the Applicant.

Mr. R. Malcomson (Assistant Government Advocate), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The applicant, Pandit Madan Mohan Nath Raina, has been convicted under sections 8 and 16 of Act VIII of 1914, an Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to motor vehicles in British India. He has been fined Rs. 1. The facts are not in dispute. The contention is that, on the actual facts, no offence has been committed under sections 8 and 16 of the Act. The facts are briefly as follows:—Mr. Raina was travelling along the road on a motor cycle when he was stopped by a Police Sergeant and asked to show his driving license. It was not in his possession at that time. He asked the Sergeant to wait for five minutes so that he might go home and bring it, but the Sergeant declined. Upon this the Sergeant took down his name and address and reported the matter to the Magistrate. The answer to the question depends upon the meaning of section 8 of the Act which runs as follows:—The driver of a motor vehicle shall produce his "license upon demand by any Police Officer." The corresponding section in the English Act III Edward VII, Chapter 36, section 3, clause 4, runs as follows:—"A license must be produced by any person driving a motor car when demanded by a Police Constable. If any person fails so to produce his license he shall be liable on summary conviction, etc." So far as the English Act is concerned there is no doubt whatsoever that it is compulsory upon a driver of a motor vehicle to carry his license with him, that he is bound to produce it at once directly a Police Constable calls upon him to do so and that failure to produce immediately upon such demand is punishable under the Act. To my mind the language of these two sections of the English Act and of the Indian Act has exactly the same meaning. A driver of the motor vehicle is the person who is actually at the time driving. He is bound under the section to produce his license upon demand. 'Upon demand" must mean immediately upon "demand." The reason is obvious. If a person driving a car has not his license and cannot produce it immediately and if he be allowed to go away, it will be open to anybody to evade the Act and at once depart and never be seen any more by the Police Officer concerned. The number on the car will only inform the Police as to the ownership of the car but it would not inform them who was the driver.

A comparison of this section with the section of the former Local Act, namely, Act II of 1911 of the United Provinces, shows that a clear alteration has been made in the law and it must have been deliberate. The former section ran as follows:—"The driver of a motor vehicle shall upon demand by any Police Officer produce his license at once or at any Police Station within twenty-four hours." That section clearly gave him the option of either producing a license on the spot or of producing it at the local Police Station within twenty-four hours. The wording of the present section seems to me to make it clear that the option has been removed and that a driver must produce his license immediately. The words "upon demand" are clear and can have only one meaning, namely, at once, directly the demand is made.

It is urged that it would be very hard lines upon many persons who accidentally leave their licenses behind and are only a short distance from home. It cannot be called hard lines on anybody. The law is known and it is easily carried out. The object of the words "upon demand" is also to enable the Police Officers to prevent unlicensed persons from driving cars, and that can only be done by giving the Police Officers power to demand immediate production of the document when they call for it. When this Act was passed, presumably the Legislature had before it the English Act and the reasons which caused the English Legislature to make it compulsory upon a driver to produce his license immediately a Constable demands it. Those reasons operate equally well in India as in England. The words in the English Act "when demanded" have exactly the same meaning as the words in the Indian Act "upon demand." In my opinion the interpretation of the law which the lower Court has adopted is correct and technically the applicant was guilty of the offence of failure to produce. The application is, therefore, dismissed.

The supply of electric light for premises let on rent is a matter of arrangement or contract between the tenant and the landlord and the charge levied by the landlord for such supply does not necessarily form part of the rent. [p. 150, col. 1.]

A landlord who charges a fair amount for electric light supplied to the premises in addition to the standard rent cannot be convicted of receiving excess rent under section 7 (1) of the Bombay Rent (War Restrictions No. 2) Act. [p. 150, col. 1.]

Criminal application for revision from conviction and sentence passed by the Acting Fourth Presidency Magistrate, Bombay.

—Mr. S. A. Shete, for the Accused.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—The petitioner in this case was charged with having committed an offence punishable under section 7, sub section 1, of the Bombay Rent (War Restrictions No. 2) Act, 1918, by charging Rs. 13-7-2 on account of rent for October 1919, whereas according to the standard rent fixed under the Act in June 1919 he was entitled to charge Rs. 13 3 2 as rent. The bill showed that he charged Rs. 13 3 2 for the rent and 4 annas extra for the electric light which was supplied on the passages in the building of which the premises in question formed a part. The learned Magistrate, who tried the case, came to the conclusion that in fixing the standard rent the Controller must have taken into account the charges for the electric light thus supplied and that by charging 4 annas more for the light he indirectly received on account of rent 4 annas more than the standard rent which he was allowed to recover and by doing so he committed an offence punishable under section 7 (1) of that Act.

In coming to this conclusion the learned Magistrate seems to have ignored the letter (Exhibit No. 1) which the present petitioner wrote to the Deputy Rent Controller on the 15th of July 1919, in which he pointed out that the rent fixed by him did not include the charge for electric lighting and that he should be allowed to recover in all from his various tenants Rs. 8 in addition to the rent fixed or permitted to stop the lighting. The reply to that latter was that the Controller had no power to determine the charges for electric lights and could not, therefore, issue orders on the subject. In spite of this the petitioner was prosecuted for having charged rent in excess of the standard rent fixed, and the Magistrate presumed that the Controller must have taken the fact of electric light being supplied to the tenants on the passages of the premises into consideration in fixing the standard rent. I do not think that in face of the reply of the Deputy Rent Controller such a presumption could be made. But apart from the presumption it is clear from the definition of the standard rent given in the principal Act (Bom. Act II of 1918) that the standard rent means in relation to any premises the rent at which the premises were let on the 1st day of January 1916 with the addition of 10 per cent. of such rent. The standard rent fixed in the present case is exactly the sum of Rs. 12, which was the rent at which the premises in question were let on the 1st day of January 1916 with the 10 per cent. added thereto. It is clear that the Controller fixed the rent according to the definition in the present case at Rs. 13-3 2. The supplying of the electric light on the passages of the building of which the premises in question form part is a matter of arrangement or contract between the tenant and the landlord. It does not necessarily form a part of the rent, and in the present case there is nothing to show that it did form part of the standard rent. The electric light on the passages came to be supplied after January 1916, and the petitioner had commenced to charge Rs. 14 as rent instead of Rs. 12, until the standard rent was fixed. But that circumstance does not alter the meaning of "standard rent", nor does it indicate that the Controller could have included the charges for electric light in the standard rent. The sum which the present petitioner is said to have charged in this case represents a fair amount for the light supplied. Whether the Act is effective to prevent any profiteering by the landlord in respect of the supply of electric lights is a question, upon which it is not necessary for me to express any opinion in this case. But, having regard to the proved facts in this case, it is quite clear that the petitioner has not received anything as rent in excess of the standard rent and that the sum of 4 annas charged for the supply of electric light has nothing to do with the standard rent. He has, therefore, committed no offence whatever.

I would, therefore, set aside the conviction and sentence and direct the fine, if paid, to be refunded.

KAJIJI, J.—I agree. I think the learned Magistrate was clearly in error when he says in his judgment that the Deputy Controller of Rents increased and decided the standard rent to be Rs. 13-3-2 when the rent of the premises in question before the 1st of January 1916 was Rs. 12. He is clearly in error, because the Controller never took into account the charge made for the supply of electric light; for on calculation it is clear that Rs. 13-3-2 is exactly 10 per cent. over Rs. 12, when our attention is drawn to Exhibit 1, viz., the letter of the landlord to the Deputy Controller and the reply on its reverse, which clearly show that he never took into account the supply of electric light to the premises. On that how can the learned Magistrate say that the Deputy Controller took into account, when he increased the rent to Rs. 13-3-2, the supply of electric light, and I think it cannot be said that under section 7 of the second Act the landlord is indirectly trying to recover more rent, because the rent recovered is Rs. 13-3 2 which has been fixed by the Deputy Controller, and, speaking for myself, I should certainly say that he would be trying to recover indirectly more rent if he charged by way of eletric light or under any other heading in his rent-bill a sum which would be by far in excess of the actual cost, viz., for light if he charged anything like Rs. 10 or Rs. 12 from each tenant? Then perhaps it may be argued that the landlord is indirectly trying to recover more rent than that fixed by the Deputy Controller. In this case nothing of that kind has been done. He charges only Rs. 8 in all. Ordinarily, if one can take judicial notice, the cost of supplying electric light comes to Rs. 5 at least. Rs. 5 is the minimum charge and in the charges the landlord charges in all Rs. 8. One cannot, therefore, say that under section 7 he was indirectly trying to recover more rent than was allowed by the Act. The conviction is bad and must be set aside and the fine refunded.

Misconduct—Pleader charged with grave criminal offences—Procedure—Misconduct in capacity of suitor, whether can be enquired into.

Proceedings under the Legal Practitioners Act are summary proceedings and they are not proper proceedings to try a Pleader for what are in reality grave criminal charges. [p. 151, col. 2.]

There is ample jurisdiction in a Court to investigate cases of moral turpitude unconnected with the discharge by a practitioner of his professional duty. The Court has complete jurisdiction to remove and suspend Pleaders and Mukhtears for causes rendering them unfit for the continued exercise of their profession. But the case of a suitor stands on a different footing, though the suitor be a Pleader or a Mukhtear. [p. 152, col. 1.]

Proceedings under the Legal Practitioners Act should not be taken against a Pleader for what is done by him in the capacity of a suitor in respect of his supposed rights as a suitor, where his conduct has no connection whatever with his professional character or anything done by him professionally. [p. 152, cols. 1 & 2.]

Appeal from a decision of the Munsif of Madhipura.

Messrs. P. K. Sen and S. S. Bose, for the Petitioner.

Messrs. C. C. Das and L. K. Jha, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.

Das, J.—We are invited in this application to quash the proceedings against the petitioner under the Legal Practitioners Act. I am of opinion that this application should succeed on two grounds; first, on the ground that the petitioner will be prejudiced by the adoption of summary procedure for the investigation of what is in reality a grave criminal charge, and secondly, on the ground that misconduct as a suitor cannot be investigated under the Legal Practitioners Act.

It is unnecessary to deal with the facts except to point out that the charges against the Pleader depend on a petition for execution which he filed against the opposite party. It is undisputed that there was a decree in favour of the petitioner for Rs. 654-6-3. It is also admitted that the opposite party paid Rs. 330 to the petitioner towards the decretal amount for which receipt was granted by the petitioner to the opposite party. But the petitioner took out fresh execution for the full amount of the decree, although the petition itself showed that there had been part payment. This is the main charge against the petitioner.

The next charge is that although the petitioner agreed to return the sum of Rs. 330 to the opposite party after the sale had taken place in execution of the decree for the full amount and deposited the amount with Babu Surendra Nath Mukherji, he subsequently withdrew the money fraudulently from Babu Surendra Nath Mukherji without any reference to the opposite party.

The last charge against the petitioner is that with a view to suppress documentary evidence of the fact that Rs. 330 had been paid by him to the opposite party, he tore off a portion of a receipt granted by him to the opposite party.

It is the case of the opposite-party that grave criminal offences have been committed by the petitioner, and indeed it cannot be disputed that if the opposite party succeeds in proving the allegations made by him, grave criminal offences have in fact been committed by the petitioner. In these circumstances the question arises whether the petitioner ought to be proceeded against under the Legal Practitioners Act.

The question was debated before the Calcutta High Court in the recent case of Chandi Charan Mitra v. Emperor (1). The learned Judges pointed out that although it was not necessary to lay down an inflexible rule that there must in every case be a trial and conviction for criminal misconduct before disbarment will be ordered, still that should be the ordinary rule, where the misconduct alleged has no direct connection with the conduct of the Pleader in his practical and immediate relation to the Court. According to the learned Judges, the test to be applied in each case is, whether the person concerned will be prejudiced by the adoption of summary procedure for the investigation of what is in reality a grave criminal charge. In my view, the proceedings taken in this case might result in an obvious injustice to the Pleader. The proceedings under the Legal Practitioners Act are summary proceedings and they are not proper proceedings to try a Pleader for what are in reality grave criminal charges.

(1) 57 Ind. Cas. 931; 31 C. L. L. 471; 24 C. W. N. 755.

In the next place there cannot be any doubt that all the charges against the Pleader are intimately connected with what was done by him in the execution proceedings. In other words, what was done by him was done in the capacity of a suitor and not in the capacity of a Pleader. I am quite aware that the words "for any other reasonable cause" in clause (f) of section 13 of the Legal Practitioners Act ought not to be read as ejusdem generis with the preceding clauses of section 13. In other words, there is ample jurisdiction in a Court to investigate cases of moral turpitude unconnected with the discharge by a practitioner of his professional duty. The Court has complete jurisdiction to remove and suspend Pleaders and Mukhtears for causes rendering them unfit for the continued exercise of their profession. But the case of a suitor stand on a different footing, though the suitor be a Pleader or a Mukhtear. We are in this case concerned with a Pleader who has acted in a particular manner as a suitor in the exercise of his supposed rights as a suitor. So far as the first charge is concerned, namely, that he presented an application for execution for the full amount although there had been a part payment of Rs 330, the charge is clearly unsustainable, because the petition on the face of it shows that there had been a part payment. If there were no other charges against the Pleader, we would have quashed the proceedings on the ground that they were bound to end in his favour. It is only the two other charges that have given us trouble in this matter. But so far as those charges are concerned, the Pleader gives an explanation which may be right or wrong but which certainly discloses that in his opinion he was entitled to act in the manner admitted by him as a suitor. In the case of Poorna Chandra Addy, In re (2) the Calcutta High Court thought that proceedings under the Legal Practitioners Act could not be taken against a Pleader for what was done by him in the capacity of a suitor in respect of his supposed rights as a suitor and of an imaginary injury done to him as a suitor, when it had no connection whatever with his professional character or anything done by him professionally. In my opinion, that is a correct view. I would accordingly quash the proceedings pending against him in the Court of the Munsif of Madhipura.

ARAMI, J.—I agree.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—All these applications were admitted on the question of sentence. Under section 41 of the Indian Factories Act, XII of 1911, if any person is employed or allowed to work contrary to any of the provisions of this Act, the occupire and manager shall be jointly and severally liable to a fine which may extend to Rs. 200. In these cases it has been found that twelve different persons were employed or allowed to work contrary to the provisions of the Act, and in respect of each offence the manager and occupier have been separately sentenced. The total fine inflicted on both comes to Rs. 300 for each offence: and the argument for the applicants is that under the section the occupier and manager are jointly and severally liable to a fine not exceeding Rs. 200. On the other hand it is argued that the occupire and manager are severally liable under the section to pay the maximum fine laid down in the section. This is a penal section and, in my opinion, it ought to be construed strictly. The natural interpretation of the clause relating to the penalty seems to be that the occupier and manager both or either of them can be required to pay a fine which may extend to Rs. 200, but that between the two they cannot be required to pay any sum exceeding Rs. 200 for each offence. It seems to me, therefore, that the applicants' contention on this point must be allowed.

It is further urged on behalf of the applicants that the sentences even then would be unduly severe. That contention I have no hesitation in rejecting. It was for the trial Court to inflict appropriate fines having due regard to the circumstances of the case; and subject to the maximum prescribed under the section I am not prepared to hold that the discretion has been improperly exercised.

The result is that for each offence in all these applications we reduce the fine, which the occupier, petitioner No. 1, is required to pay from Rs. 200 to Rs. 100. The effect of this modification in the sentences will be that for the employment of twelve different persons, between the occupier and the manager they will have to pay in all a fine of Rs. 2,400.

The excess of fine, if paid, should be refunded.

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 456 OF 1919.

MANNU—ACCUSED—APPELLANT

EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

U. P. Municipalities Act (II of 1916), ss. 298 (G) (x), 299, 318 - License to store wood, refusal of, by Municipal Board—Appeal, failure to prefer, effect of—Storing wood inspite of refusal—Offence.

Accused, after having been twice convicted for storing fire wood on a plot of land without a license from the Municipal Board, applied for the grant of a license, but the Board, without assigning any reason, definitely and peremptorily refused the application. He continued, however, to use the site for the purpose of storing wood, with the result that he was again prosecuted and convicted. In revision to the High Court:

Held, that on his application for a license being refused accused had a remedy by an appeal under section 318 of the U. P. Municipalities Act and not having preferred such appeal but having persisted in using the land for storing wood without a license, he had been rightly convicted. [p. 157, col. 1.]

Criminal revision from an order of the Magistrate, First Class, Cawnpore.

Mr. Kailas Nath Katju, for the Appellant.

Mr. R. Malcomson (Assistant Government Advocate), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application in revision by one Mannu, who is the occupier of a certain plot of ground situated on or near the banks of the Ganges within the limits of the Municipality of Cawnpore. In the year 1914 a dispute arose between the said Mannu and the Municipal Board of Cawnpore, the Board claiming that the land in question belonged to them as nazul and that Mannu was occupying it without their consent. The attempt then made to eject Mannu from the site by means of proceedings in a Criminal Court came to nothing, because the Court was satisfied that there was a bona fide dispute between the parties on the question of title. After the United Provinces Municipalities Act (No. II of 1916) had come into force, certain bye laws were duly promulgated by the Municipal Board of Cawnpore under Part G(x) of section 298 of the said Act, and since then Mannu has been twice prosecuted for the offence of using the plot of ground in question for storing wood without a license granted by the Municipal Board. On the first occasion the prosecution came before this Court in revision and the matter was dealt with by myself in a judgment to be found in Mannua v. Emperor (1). Since that judgment was pronounced Mannu has formally applied to the proper authorities to grant him a license for storing wood, up to the prescribed limit of one thousand maunds, on the site in question and this license has been definitely and peremptorily refused him. He continued nevertheless to use the site as before for the purpose of storing wood and the result is that he has been again prosecuted to conviction. The application now before me is against the order of a Magistrate of the first class convicting Mannu and sentencing him to a small fine. In admitting the application I seem to have overlooked, or condoned, the omission of Mannu to apply in the first instance in revision either to the Sessions Judge or to the District Magistrate, but in any case the questions raised by the applicant have been fully argued out before me and I propose to deal with the matter on its merits.

It has been suggested before me that Mannu has not really been guilty of a breach of any bye-law, because in his application for a license he offered to be bound by all conditions laid down in the bye-laws themselves, subject to which a license for storing wood on any place within Municipal limits is ordinarily granted, and no evidence has been offered to show that Mannu has not in fact observed all those conditions. This argument overlooks the wording of section 299 (1) of the United Provinces Municipalities Act (No. II of 1916) and the fact that the conviction has been recorded for using the site in question for storing wood "in default of a license granted by the Board." The question of the due observance of the conditions prescribed in the bye-laws could only arise in the case of a man to whom a license had been granted.

It is, however, contended that, if the bye-laws on the subject be properly considered and given effect to as a whole, it should be held that the Municipal Board is bound to grant a license to any one who is prepared to abide by the prescribed conditions, unless it be found that the necessary license cannot be granted in respect of the particular site in question without prejudice to the health, safety or convenience of the inhabitants of the Municipality. It has in substance been conceded in argument that, if the Municipal Board in rejecting Mannu's application for a license had placed it on record that in their opinion there were reasons connected with the health, safety or convenience of the inhabitants of the Municipality which rendered it inadvisable that the particular site in question should be used for the purpose of storing wood, it would not be open to the Criminal Courts, on a prosecution like the present, to go into the question of the adequacy of the reasons assigned for refusing a license. At any rate I am clearly of opinion that this would be so. Even in the strongest case which the applicant has been able to quote on his side, namely, the case of Haji Ismail Haji Essac v. Municipal Commissioner of Bombay (2), it is clearly laid down that the Court cannot substitute its judgment for that of the Municipal Commissioner, or interfere in such a matter as the refusal of a license, unless it is clear beyond doubt that the Municipal Commissioner is using his authority with some indirect motive and for a collateral purpose, not for the purpose for which the Legislature has armed him with the power. The case for the applicant, however, is that, upon the facts now before me, this Court ought to interfere in order to enforce the principle laid down in this ruling. It is represented that the plot of land in question is of no practical use to Mannu, unless he is permitted to use it for the purpose of storing wood and that the Municipal Board, in refusing him a license, is not acting with any purpose of promoting or maintaining the health, safety or convenience of the inhabitants of the Municipality but simply in order to serve a collateral purpose by compelling Mannu to give up the piece of land about which he has a dispute with the Municipal Board on the question of title. So far as the record before me goes, it does not appear that the Municipal Board of Cawnpore considers that the health, safety or convenience of the inhabitants of the Municipality is in any away concerned in the question of Mannu's using the site in question for the storing of wood. It is possible that some such question may be involved, but the Municipal Board has elected to fight the matter out to this Court upon the pure question of the limits of its authority. It has refused to grant Mannu a license without giving any reasons for its refusal, and it has not felt itself bound to put forward any reasons for that refusal, either in the Court of the trying Magistrate or even in the course of argument before this Court. I feel justified, therefore, in dealing with the point on the materials before me and in accepting, at least for the sake of argument, the applicant's contention that no question of the health, safety or convenience of the inhabitants of the Municipality of Cawnpore is involved in the use which he desires to make of the plot of land in question and that he has been refused a license simply because the members of the Municipal Board, having a claim against him that he has no right to occupy this piece of land at all, do not choose to stultify themselves by granting him a license to use it for any particular purpose. Incidentally, no doubt, this refusal on the part of the Municipal Board may bring considerable pressure upon Mannu to submit without further resistance to the claim of the Municipal Board in the matter of the title to the disputed site, and may thus be said to serve a collateral purpose within the meaning of that expression as used by the learned Judges of the Bombay High Court, but I have thought it fair to state the point as it might reasonably appear to the members of the Municipal Board when dealing with Mannu's application for a license.

In substance, therefore, the question of law which I am called upon to decide presents itself to my mind somewhat as follows. Mannu has been guilty of a breach of the law in continuing to use this plot of land for the purpose of storing wood after he had been refused a license by the Municipal Board; should the Criminal Courts refuse to enforce the provisions of the Statute, that is to say, of Local Act No. II of 1916, according to their plain meaning, merely on the ground that there seems reason for suspecting that the Municipal Board of Cawnpore is using its powers under that Statute in an oppressive manner and not in accordance with the spirit of section 298 of the Act? It must be remembered that in the Bombay case to which I have already referred, the High Court was dealing with a question which arose before it in the exercise of its powers under section 45 of the Specific Relief Act (No. I of 1877). The provisions of that section confine its operation to the Presidency towns and to the High Courts of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay in the exercise of their original civil jurisdiction. They have, therefore, no application to the facts now before me. Looking at the decisions of other High Courts in cases in which a question has arisen as to the proper exercise by a Municipal Board of the powers with which it has been armed by the Legislature, I find that the Madras High Court in Somu Pillai v. Municipal Council, Mayavaram (3) refused to enforce an agreement which depended for its efficacy on what was, in the opinion of the Hon'ble Court, a misuse on the part of the Municipal Board concerned of its discretion in the matter of granting or witholding licenses. In the course of this decision the learned Judges have made some strong remarks regarding the duty laid upon Municipal Boards of using a sound and equitable discretion in the exercise of their powers, but the ruling itself has little or no bearing on the question now in issue before me. The Court had to decide mainly whether a certain agreement was or was not enforceable, and what they really found was that the contract in question was against public policy. On the other hand the Calcutta High Court has in two different cases, one on the civil side and one on the criminal side, laid down principles which, if applied to the facts of the present case, would be quite fatal to the application before me. I refer to Moran v. Chairman of Motihari Municipality (4) and Queen-Empress v. Mukunda Chunder Chatterjee (5). The latter case is particularly important, because the learned Judges were clearly of opinion that the Municipal Board with which they were dealing had abused its powers under the Statute and they go so far as to suggest that the Legislature, in framing the Statute in question, could scarcely have contemplated arming Municipal Boards with powers so liable to misuse; nevertheless they laid down the general principle that, under the Bengal Municipal Act with which they were dealing (Bengal Act No. III of 1884), it was entirely within the discretion of the Municipal Commissioners to grant or refuse a license for a market and the Courts had no jurisdiction to control such power, however arbitrarily exercised. It has, however, been contended that there are cases of this Court which support a contrary view. One of these is Ganga Narain v. Municipal Board of Cawnpore (6). There are expressions used in the course of the judgment of this Court in that case which lend some support to the applicant's contention; but the case in itself is no authority for any proposition of law which would warrant my interference in the matter now before me. The case then before this Court was a second appeal from a decree of a District Judge passed in the exercise of his civil jurisdiction. The Statute with which this Court was concerned was the N. W. P., and Oudh Municipalities Act (No. XV of 1883), and the fact that the Civil Courts had jurisdiction to entertain a suit for an injunction against a Municipal Board upon the facts alleged in the plaint either was not contested, or had already been disposed of in favour of the then plaintiff with reference to the terms of the particular Act then in force. The other case relied upon in support of this application is that of Emperor v. Bal Kishan (7). That case is more nearly in point. A learned Judge of this Court who had to deal with the question of the conviction of the applicant in revision for breach of a certain bye-law passed by the Municipal Board of Naini Tal, held on the authority of the rule of law prevailing in England that, before a criminal Court will affirm a conviction for breach of a bye-law passed by such an authority as a Municipal Board, it is entitled to examine the terms of the bye-law in order to discover whether it is reasonable in itself. It might under some circumstances have been necessary for me to consider whether this principle would now be affirmed by a Bench of this Court in respect of a bye-law passed under the present Act (No. II of 1916), in view more particularly of the provisions of sections 318 and 321 of that Act. I think it unnecessary to consider this, because in my opinion the principle of law laid down in Emperor v. Bal Kishan (7) does not go anything like the length of the contention raised by the present applicant. There is no question now before me as to the reasonableness of the bye-laws passed by the Cawnpore Municipal Board under section 298G (x) of the aforesaid Act. The bye laws in question are obviously reasonable and calculated to promote the health, safety and convenience of the inhabitants of the Municipality. What I have been asked to consider is whether the facts laid before me amount to an abuse on the part of the Municipal Board of the powers conferred upon it by the Statute and the bye laws made thereunder and, if so, what would be the legal consequence of such abuse of power upon a prosecution like the present.

There has been some argument before me as to whether the provisions of section 318 of Local Act (No. II of 1916) would apply to the facts of the present case. That discussion is not really relevant, because the validity of the conviction of Mannu for breach of the rule prohibiting unlicensed persons to use any plot of land within Municipal limits for the purpose of storing wood does not depend upon the consideration of the remedies, if any, open to Mannu against the refusal of the Municipal Board to grant him the license for which he applied. The point has, however, been argued before me and I should not be doing the applicant any service if I refrain from expressing the opinion at which I have arrived. I have no doubt myself that an order of the Municipal Board refusing to grant a license under a bye-law made under heading G of section 298 is just as much an order or direction made by the Board under the aforesaid bye-law as would be an order of the Board granting the license instead of refusing it. I have no doubt, therefore, that Mannu had a remedy in this case by appealing against the order of the Board to the officer appointed by the Local Government for the purpose. If I am right in this view, it would seem to follow that the Board's order refusing a license could not be questioned by suit in any Civil Court; but on this point I do not pronounce any final opinion, because questions might arise as to the competence of the Local Legislature to take away the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts in such a matter.

EMPEROR v. HAJI ABOO.

The conclusion I have arrived at on the whole case is that Mannu should have sought his remedy by an appeal under section 3.8 of Local Act (No. II of 1916) and that he has been rightly convicted of the offence charged, in view of the fact that without preferring such appeal he has asserted his right to use the land in question for the purpose of storing wood without holding any license from the Municipal Board. Something has been said on the question of sentence, but the learned Magistrate has taken into consideration the circumstances of the case and the remarks made by this Court when passing judgment in respect of the former prosecution. The sentence which he has passed is almost nominal and I do not feel called upon to reduce it further. The result is that I reject this application.

No offence can be committed under section 142 (1) of the Bombay District Municipal Act with reference to meat which is a perishable article. The only power which the section gives to a Municipality is the power to destroy forthwith any article which is of a perishable nature, and which in its opinion is diseased, unsound, unwholesome or unfit for food, drink and medicine.

Criminal reference made by the District Magistrate, Thana.

Mr. K. N. Koyajee, for the Complainant.

Mr. D. G. Patwardhan, for the Accused.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the accused have been convicted under section 142 (1) of the Bombay District Municipal Act (Bombay Act III of 1901) for selling at a beef stall meat unfit for human food. The District Magistrate of Thana has made a reference to this Court against these convictions.

No offence with reference to meat which is an article of a perishable nature could have been committed under section 142 (1) and the convictions are clearly wrong. The power which the section gives to the Municipality is the power to destroy forthwith any article which is of a perishable nature, and which in its opinion is diseased, unsound, unwholesome or unfit for food, drink and medicine. The last paragraph of sub-section (1) relates to any animal and any article which is not of a perishable nature, and which under the next preceding paragraph can be taken before a Magistrate. Mr. Koyajee for the Municipality has not contested this position. But he has suggested in the argument before us that these convictions ought to be upheld on the ground that the facts which are alleged in the information disclose an offence under section 273 of the Indian Penal Code. It is clear that the complaint related to an offence under a special Act, and not to an offence under section 273; and it would not be fair to allow the case at this stage to be treated as one relating to an offence under the Indian Penal Code. Further, having regard to the wording of the last paragraph of the sub-section, the Magistrate's finding involves the result that the provisions of section 273, Indian Penal Code, do not apply to this case. We, therefore, set aside the convictions and sentences, and direct the fine, if paid, to be refunded.

The plea of grave and sudden provocation is not open to a person who, merely because his relatives are abused, arms himself with a knife and attacks a defenceless man inflicting severe injuries The conviction of such a person under section 307 of the Penal Code is not invalid. [p. 158, col. 2.]

Where a person commits an assault upon another and a third person joins in committing the assault, it is a fair inference that the two were acting in concert [p. 158, col. 2.]

Criminal appeal against the order of the Sessions Judge, Badaun, dated the 26th of November 1919.

Mr. Nehal Chand, for the Accused.

The Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—Abdul Karim and Abdul Aziz have been convicted of an offence under section 307, Indian Penal Code, and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for seven years each. The facts are not denied. It appears that on the 5th of October 1919 when Jamal-ud-din, the person assaulted, returned home in the evening between 6 and 7, his sons complained that they had been scolded by Abdul Aziz, one of the accused. Upon this Jamal-ud-Din went to Abdul Aziz with the intention and object of reproving him. He asked Abdul Aziz why he scolded his sons in his absence. Abdul Aziz admitted having scolded his sons and added: "I will now beat you:" Abdul Aziz then caught hold of Jamal-ud-Din while, as the deposition goes, Abdul Karim struck him with a knife in the belly. The two accused have been defended by a learned Counsel in this Court. The contention is that because the evidence does not prove that Abdul Aziz had any common intention with Abdul Karim to stab Jamal-ud-Din, Abdul Aziz ought to have been acquitted. The contention on behalf of Abdul Karim is that his offence does not fall within the provisions of section 307, Indian Penal Code, inasmuch as the injury was inflicted by him on a sudden and grave provocation. This latter contention may be brushed aside at once. The provisions of section 300, exception 4, have not been remembered. Whether the abuse of mother and sister is grave and sudden provocation, may be open to question; but there is no doubt that a person whose relations have been thus abused cannot take a knife and fall upon a defenceless man and then plead that he was led to do the act by grave and sudden provocation. There can be no doubt whatever that if death had resulted from the act of Abdul Karim, he would have been guilty of murder. As regards the contention raised on behalf of Abdul Aziz it is true that we have not in so many words a deposition on oath that Abdul Karim called upon Abdul Aziz to commit this act, but on reading the whole of the evidence together it is evident that Abdul Aziz was the first person to commit an assault upon Jamal-ud-Din and that while he was in the act of committing the assault Abdul Karim struck Jamal-ud-Din with a knife. A fair inference is that the two were acting in concert. At any rate it lay upon Abdul Aziz to put forward evidence showing that he was completely separate from Abdul Karim when he did this act and that he had no connection whatever with the act. To explain that one needs only to look at the statement made by Abdul Aziz. It is not to the effect: "True; I did lay hold of Jamal-ud Din but I never anticipated for a single moment that my act will be followed up by the act done by Abdul Karim." On the contrary he denies having had any participation in the assault upon Jamal-ud-Din altogether. So far I consider the conviction by the learned Sessions Judge justified. At the same time there is no doubt that this was a sad act caused no doubt by an utter want of self-discipline and control in this household of Jamal-ud-Din. The uncle lost his temper, the nephews equally were out of control, specially Abdul Karim rushed upon his uncle much after the manner of a savage beast instead of a civilized man. It is not likely that this offence will repeat itself so as to cause any alarm. It is to be hoped that the lesson learnt by Abdul Karim will be remembered by him the whole of his life and though he did not realise then, he has by this time realised the savage nature of his conduct. I reduce the sentence passed upon him to a sentence of five (5) years' rigorous imprisonment, and the sentence passed upon Abdul Aziz to a sentences of rigorous imprisonment for two years and six months. The sentences will commence to run from the date on which the original sentences were passed.

Application against the order of the Magistrate, Shahabad, dated the 14th January 1920.

Messrs. G. C. Pal and Shambhu Saran, for the Petitioner.

Messrs. P. K. Sen, Shahabuddin Khan and S. S. Bose, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This application is directed against an order of the Magistrate of Shahabad, dated the 14th January 1920, declaring under section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure the possession of the 1st party, Ramsidh Singh, on behalf of his principals, Musammat Ratan Koer and Birendra Bahadur.

Musammat Ratan Koer is wife of one Rajbans Narain Singh, and Birendra Bahadur is son of Raghubans, a deceased brother of Rajbans. The 2nd party, Kulbans Narayan Singh, is cousin of Rajbans, four degrees removed. The lands in dispute 25·12, acres, consisting of 34 plots, are the bakasht lands of the proprietor, situate in three Tauzis, No. 11151 village Mustafapur Bhadwar, No. 9565 village Dumra and No. 10165 village Chatar. Sixteen annas of the aforesaid Tauzis were sold in execution of a money-decree of Padam Kuer against Rajbans and were purchased by the 2nd party Kulbans Narain Singh on the 9th April 1918. On the 27th August, delivery of possession was effected by a Civil Court peon under a writ of the Court.

Rajbans instituted a proceeding to set aside the sale. Kulbans got his name registered under the Land Registration Act in respect of 16 annas in Tauzi No. 10165, but in respect of 8 annas only in Tauzi Nos. 11151 and 9565, leaving apparently 8-annas share of Birendra Bahadur, who was not a party to the Civil Court sale or dakhaldehani. The share was corrected in a proceeding under section 28 of the Land Registration Act, terminating with the order of the Deputy Collector, dated the 18th September 1919.

The case of the 1st party is that Rajbans was of wasteful habits and was incurring unnecessary debts. The Sub Divisional Officer of Arrah, therefore, induced him to execute a deed of gift in favour of his wife, Ratan Kuer, in respect of all his properties, but, in the meantime, the aforesaid Tauzis were put up to auction. Ratan Koer, in order to prevent the properties going into the hands of a stranger, purchased them at auction sale with her own money and, with a view to conceal the purchase from her husband, availed herself of the name of Kulbans, the 2nd party, a near relation of her husband, and that the Civil Court purchase, dakhaldehani and the land registration were all done in the name of Kulbans, benamidar of Musammat Ratan Koer; whereas Ratan Koer and Birendra Bahadur were jointly in possession of the properties, including the lands in dispute, the 2nd party after the last order in the Land Registration Department, dated the 18th September, taking advantage of his name appearing in the aforesaid proceedings, on the 2nd October 1919 tried to interfere with the cutting of the crops then standing on the lands in dispute, which were grown by the 1st party on behalf of Ratan Koer.

The 2nd party Kulbans Narain Singh denies being a fareidar of Musammat Ratan Koer and asserts that he is the real purchaser and has obtained joint possession with Birendra Bahadur of the properties purchased, and this year by a private parti tion with him the lands in dispute have been allotted to him and that he has exclusively grown the crop in dispute. He further contends that his name having been registered under the Land Registration Act, which is based upon possession, the criminal Court under section 145 must presume that the possession was with him and recognise it by an order under that section. This view is no doubt supported by the decision in the case of Gobind Chunder Moitra v. Abdul Sayed (1), which has held that a summary adjudication upon the question of possession by the Land Registration Officer under Act VII of 1876 stands pari passu with the decision of a Civil Court and is entitled to the same respect on the question of possession in a proceeding under section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure as a decree of a Civil Court. I am in full accord with that view. But there was no dispute in the land registration case between Musammat Ratan Koer and Kulbans Narain Singh and, therefore, there could be no adjudication of possession between them, her case being that the name of Kulbans was registered with her consent in order to preserve the farzi character of the auction purchase. The ruling in question has, therefore, no application to the present case.

If the case of the 1st party is true, the documentary evidence consisting of the Civil Court dakhaldehani of the 27th June 1918, the Land Registration decrees and orders, the last being of the 13th September 1919, must necessarily be in the name of Kulbans, the 2nd party. The lower Court has also held upon the consideration of the oral evidence, particularly of Basdeo Saran Singh, witness No. 2, a relation of both the parties, and Pandit Bishun Datt Pathak, witness No. 8 who proves the admission of the 2nd party in the proceeding instituting by Rajbans to set aside the sale, that property was purchased by Musammat Ratan Koer in the farzi name of Kulbans and that it would be reconveyed to her, and that upon that assurance Rajbans withdrew his objection to the sale.

I need hardly in a summary proceeding, as this, deal with the question of benami raised in the case, which is more properly within the province of the Civil Court to decide, inasmuch as the finding of the Court below as to the actual possession and the growing of the crop on the land in question is a finding of fact. The Magistrate has discussed the oral evidence on both sides and has for very cogent reasons accepted the evidence on behalf of 1st party and rejected that of 2nd party. The witnesses of the 1st party are mostly boundary men. Basudeo Saran Singh, witness No. 1, equally related to both the parties, and Lal Behari Lal witness No. 12, an accredited musaddi of both the parties, clearly prove the possession of the 1st party over the plots in question. I, therefore, accept the finding of the Magistrate as to the actual possession of the lands in dispute and uphold the orders made by him under section 145 of the Code.

I do not, however, appreciate the criticism of the lower Court against the Civil Court dakhaldehani, inasmuch as the case of Musammat Ratan Koer, one of the principals of the 1st party, and of Rajbans, the 2nd party, as presented in this Court and as disclosed in their respective written statements is based on the dakhaldehani, the only dispute between them being as to the real or farzi nature of the purchase. If the dakhaldehani was fictitious, as held by the Court below, the property continued to be in the possession of the judgment-debtor, Rajbans, and he would, then, have been a necessary party to the proceedings under section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. It may be pointed out that the learned Magistrate is also wrong in referring in his judgment to the Police report and the evidence contained therein upon the factum of possession. It is not admissible for any purpose excepting for initiating the proceeding. The finding of possession is, however, based upon other good evidence.

The result is that the application must be dismissed.

Appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Fyzabad, dated the 22nd November 1918, reversing that of the Munsif, Fyzabad, dated the 21st May 1918.

Babu Bisheshwar Nath Srivastava, for the Appellant.

Mr. A. P. Sen, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The defendant respondent and his father executed a mortgage deed in favour of the plaintiff appellant on the 21st of June 1906 for a sum of Rs. 1,150. In the mortgage-deed it is stated that the mortgagee has been placed in possession of the mortgaged property, and that out of the total consideration of Rs. 1,150, Rs. 550 has been left for payment to other creditors, "ki digar mahajan ko ada kare." It has also been definitely stated in the mortgage-deed that the property mortgaged was up to the time of the mortgage in the possession of the mortgagors and that it was free of all encumbrances, except a prior mortgage in favour of the plaintiff mortgagee which has been mentioned at the foot of the deed. The plaintiff was in fact not put in possession of the mortgaged property and he brought the present suit on the 1st of May 1917 for possession of the property.

The defendant among other pleas pleaded that as the plaintiff had not paid Rs. 550 to prior creditors and as he had in consequence himself to redeem a prior mortgage held by Ram Sudist, the plaintiff is not entitled to possession of the mortgaged property.

The Court of first instance found that the sum of Rs 550 left with the plaintiff had been expended in paying off certain debts due from the defendant's father to Raghubar and Sri Dat and decreed the plaintiff's suit.

In appeal the learned District Judge held that the evidence relating to the payment to Raghubar and Sri Dat was false and that the plaintiff had failed to prove that any portion of the sum of Rs. 550 left with him had been expended in payment to the mortgagor's creditors. He has on this finding dismissed the plaintiff's claim for possession of the mortgaged property.

In second appeal it is urged that the finding of fact that a portion only of the consideration for the mortgage has been paid by the mortgagee is not sufficient to justify the dismissal of the plaintiff's suit for possession and reliance is placed on Tirumal Raju v. Pandla Muthial Naidu (1), Rashik Lal v. Ram Narain (2), Munshi Bajrangi Sahai v. Udit Narain Singh (3) and Bhagbai v. Narayan Gopal (4). On the other hand the learned Counsel for the defendant-respondent relies on Husaini v. Ram Charan (5) and the principle stated in Frag v. Babu Mohan Lal (6) to the effect that he who seeks equity must do equity and a person cannot expect another to abide by the contract which he himself has broken.

It seems to me that the ruling in Husaini v. Ram Charan (5) is not applicable to the present case. In that case the mortgagee was placed in possession of a portion of the mortgaged property. The remainder of the mortgaged property was in the possession of a prior mortgagee and a portion of the consideration had been left with the plaintiff mortgagee for redemption of the prior mortgage. Patently the mortgagor could not place the plaintiff in possession until the prior mortgage was redeemed. The plaintiff, however, failed to redeem the prior mortgage, although the money for doing so had been left with him and the defendant herself had after a very long period of time redeemed the prior mortgage. It was held in that case that the provisions of section 54 of the Indian Contract Act applied and that the plaintiff having failed to perform his part of the promise the performance of which must necessarily precede the performance of the promise of the defendant to put the plaintiff in possessior, the plaintiff was not entitled to a decree. In the present case clearly section 54 of the Indian Contract Act has no application. The mortgage-deed itself recites that the mortgagee has been placed in possession of the property which is free from all encumbrances except a mortgage-debt due to the mortgagee himself, and a portion of the consideration was, apart altogether from the question of possession, left with the mortgagee for payment of other debts due by the mortgagor. Those other debts were not specified in any way, nor was the payment of those debts a condition precedent to the delivery of possession to the mortgagee.

There is a consensus of opinion that in cases like the present the mortgage is a good mortgage for the amount of consideration actually paid, and it seems to me that in the special circumstances of this case there is not good reason why the plaintiff-appellant should not be given possession in accordance with the terms of the mortgage-deed. But as remarked by Mr. Justice Chamier in the case of Rashik Lal v. Ram Narain (2), the decree for possession should be conditional on the mortgagee paying to the mortgagor that portion of the consideration which was left with him. It is urged on behalf of the defendant-respondent that he is willing and ready to redeem the mortgage, but in the present case which is a suit for possession in the terms of the mortgage deed, I do not think that the mortgagor has a right to elect whether possession should be delivered or the mortgage should be redeemed and the question as to the amount payable on redemption cannot be determined: Fakira Khan v. Badullah Khan (7) and Muhammad Sher Khan v. Raja Seth Swami Dayal (8). It is true that there is nothing in the terms of the deed to prevent the mortgagor from at once bringing a suit for redemption and in order to avoid further litigation, I have attempted, but without success, to persuade the parties to come to terms. They would clearly be well advised even now to settle their dispute without further litigation.

I allow the appeal and decree the plaintiff's suit for possession on condition of payment to the defendant of the sum of Rs. 550 within one month from this date. If payment be not made within the time allowed, the plaintiff's suit for possession will stand dismissed with costs. In the circumstances of the case I direct that the parties pay their own costs in all Courts.

ALLAHABAD HIGH COURT.

CIVIL REVISION No. 42 OF 1919.
June, 12, 1920.
Present :—Justice Sir Grimwood Meare, KT., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Sulaiman.
Mahant BASDEO GIR—PETITIONER
PREETAM GIR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Religious Endowments Act (XX of 1863), ss. 4, 5—District Judge, jurisdiction of, to proceed under s. 5, when arises.

Before section 5 of the Religious Endowments Act can be made applicable to a case, it is clear from a perusal of sections 4 and 5 of the Act that the property in question should be one which had been under the management of any trustee, manager, or superintendent at the time of the passing of the Act and that the said property should have been transferred to such trustee, manager or superintendent by the Local Government as directed by that Act. [p. 164, col. 1.]

BASDEO GIR v. PREETAM GIR.

Messrs. Haribans Sahai and Lakhmi Narain, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Purushottam Das Tandon, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application in revision under section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure against an order of the District Judge of Ghazipur, dated the 14th of December 1917. Before we can interfere in this revision, we have to be satisfied that the case falls under one or other of the three clauses of section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The property in dispute in this case belongs to a math situated in Qasba Bairia. It appears that in 1901 a suit was brought under section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the removal of the then trustee and that ultimately, in 1903 the trustee was removed and another trustee was appointed by the District Judge. There were several successors to that trustee, the last one being one Rama Nand Gir. Rama Nand Gir died on the 7th of October 1916. On his death a dispute seems to have arisen as to the succession to that math. There was an application for mutation of names made by Basdeo Gir, which was resisted by one Musammat Sewa Giri, alias Sudhi Mai, and one Sheo Ram Gir. On the 20th of October 1916 Musammat Sewa Giri, alias Sudhi Mai, filed an application in the Court of the District Judge of Ghazipur to the effect that Rama Nand Gir had died and that the math was without any head and manager. The application purported to be an application under Act XX of 1863, and it was prayed that an order for the management of the said math should be passed immediately and the whole of the property should be confiscated and made over to the Collector. This application was supported by an affidavit. The learned District Judge, without issuing notice to any other party concerned and apparently without holding any enquiry at all, passed an order there and then appointing the Collector of Ballia as the manager of the math and directing that he should continue to act as such until some other person should by suit have established his right of succession to the gaddi of the math. After this, on the 15th of November 1916, Basdeo Gir brought a suit for a declaration that he was a Mahant. In this suit he had impleaded Musammat Sewa Giri, Sheo Ram Gir and also the Collector of Ballia. On the 4th of April 1917 he obtained an ex parte decree. Having obtained his decree, he filed an application on the 11th of April 1917 in the Court of the District Judge praying that inasmuch as he had established his title to the math, the property should be handed over to him. On the next day the learned District Judge passed an order directing that the Collector of Ballia should deliver the possession of the property to Basdeo Gir. This order also seems to have been passed without there having been any formal enquiry. Sheo Ram Gir, a defendant against whom the ex parte decree had been obtained, applied for setting aside that decree on the ground that the summons had not been served on him. The decree was set aside as against Sheo Ram Gir on the 26th of May 1917; the other two defendants, however, not having made any application for the setting aside of that decree, the decree against them stood good. After the case had been restored, an application seems to have been made by Sheo Ram Gir to the District Judge requesting him to hand over possession of the property to the Collector. On the 6th of June 1917 the learned District Judge dismissed that application, holding that inasmuch as the decree had been set aside only as against Sheo Ram Gir, he was not prepared to deprive Basdeo Gir of the math property pending the disposal of the suit as against Sheo Ram Gir. When Basdeo Gir found that Sheo Ram Gir was prepared to contest his claim, he thought fit to withdraw his suit and exempt him. On this the learned Subordinate Judge before whom the case was pending passed an order on the 16th of August 1917 saying that as the plaintiff did not wish to have his title threshed out as against the defendant Sheo Ram Gir, his suit against that defendant must be dismissed. He accordingly dismissed the suit as against Sheo Ram Gir. In the meantime one Jagdesha Nand had brought a civil suit against Basdeo Gir for a declaration that he himself was the rightful trustee of this math property and that the defendant Basdeo Gir was not a trustee at all. This suit appears to have been dismissed by the first Court on the 25th of August 1917. The learned Subordinate Judge held that Jagdesha

Nand had failed to prove that he was the trustee of the property. He, however, also went on to find that Basdeo Gir, the defendant, had failed to prove his title. A copy of this judgment was directed to be sent to the District Judge of Ghazipur for consideration. On the arrival of a copy of this judgment in the Court of the District Judge two applications were filed; one was an application by Basdeo Gir, dated the 3rd of September, 1917, and another by one Mahant Preetam Gir, dated the 18th of September 1917. In his application dated the 3rd of September 1917 Basdeo Gir pleaded that Act XX of 1863 had no application to the math property at all and he also urged that the finding of the learned subordinate Judge in Jagdesha Nand's suit on Issue No. 4 was wholly unnecessary for the decision of that suit and should not be taken into account. Mahant Preetam Gir, however, urged that the judgment of the Subordinate Judge was conclusive and that the endowed property ought to be confiscated. It was on these applications that the District Judge on the 14th of December 1917 ordered that the Collector should take over possession of this property from Basdeo Gir. It is this last order which is the subject of revision in this Court.

On behalf of the applicant it is contended that before the learned District Judge proceeded to act under this Act, he should have satisfied himself that he had jurisdiction to act. Before section 5 of Act XX of 1863 can be made applicable, it is clear from a perusal of sections 4 and 5 of the Act that the property in question should be one which had been under the management of any trustee, manager or superintendent at the time of the passing of the Act and that the said property should have been transferred to such trustee, manager or superintendent by the Local Government as directed by that Act. Section 5 clearly says that "whenever from any cause a vacancy shall occur in the office of any trustee, manager or superintendent to whom any property shall have been transferred under the last preceding section, and any dispute shall arise respecting the right of succession to such office, it shall be lawful for any person interested in the mosque, temple or religious establishment to which such property shall belong, or in the performance of the worship or of the service thereof or the trusts relating thereto, to apply to the Civil Court to appoint a manager, etc." We are of opinion that it is clear from the language of sections 4 and 5 that the District Judge would have jurisdiction to appoint a temporary manager of trust property under section 5 of the Act only in the case where a vacancy has occurred in the office of trustee to whom such property shall have been transferred under section 3 of the Act. This is the view taken by the Madras High Court in Ittuni Panikkar v. Irani Nambudripad (1) and Gopala Ayyar v. Arunachallam Chetty (2) and by the Calcutta High Court in Sheo Nandan Gir v. Dhupan Upadhya (3). If then it be the fact that this is not a case which falls under section 4 of the Act, then the District Judge would have no jusisdiction to proceed under section 5.

On behalf of the respondent, however, it is contended that this point had not been raised expressly before the District Judge, and that in fact the applicant Basdeo Gir had acquiesced and acted upon the order of the District Judge dated the 20th of October 1916, and that, therefore, it is clear from the conduct of Basdeo Gir himself that he had accepted that this case was governed by Act XX of 1863. In our opinion in view of the clear plea raised by him in his application dated the 3rd of September 1917, it is impossible for us to hold that he by his act is estopped from raising the question of jurisdiction of the District Judge. If the District Judge had considered this question of jurisdiction at all, in howsoever cursory a manner, we would have been very reluctant to interfere, but in our opinion, he has not directed his attention to the plea raised by Basdeo. As far as we have been able to ascertain, there is no evidence on the record to show whether this endowment existed in 1863 or not, and whether this had ever been transferred by the Local Government to the trustee. This point has not been decided. Further, we find that the learned District Judge in his order dated the 14th of December 1917 set aside his previous order, on the sole ground, as he says, that the ex parte decree which was the basis of his previous order had been exploded by the judgment of the Subordinate Judge in Suit No 64 of 1917 At the time when this order was passed, the judgment of the Subordinate Judge had not become final, and our attention had been invited to the fact that on appeal the High Court has modified the decree of the Subordinate Judge and has held that the declaration contained therein to the effect that Basdeo Gir was not the trustee of the property ought to be expunged. In our opinion this also was an irregularity committed by the District Judge. At the same time we quite appreciate the contention advanced on behalf of the respondent that Basdeo Gir had not yet established his clear title in a Civil Court in a fair fight. The ex parte decree which he had obtained against the Collector, Sheo Ram Gir and Musammat Sewa Giri was subsequently challenged by Sheo Ram Gir, on whose application the ex parte decree was actually set aside. Basdeo Gir, however, showed no inclination to fight out the case against Sheo Ram Gir who was prepared to contest his claim, and feeling shy of the fight he withdrew his suit as against Sheo Ram Gir. The ultimate order passed by the District Judge was an order dismissing the suit of Basdeo Gir as against Sheo Ram Gir. As matters stand, there are in one sense two Civil Court decrees, one an ex parte decree in favour of Basdeo Gir against the Collector and Musammat Sewa Giri, and the other a decree dismissing Basdeo Gir's suit against Sheo Ram Gir.

(1) 3 M 401; 1 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 834.
(2) 26 M. 85.
(3) 7 Ind. Cas. 164; 14 C. W. N. 1104.

If the District Judge, after an enquiry, is of opinion that section 5 of Act XX of 1863 applies to the case and that he has jurisdiction to proceed under that section, he would, in our opinion, be quite justified in allowing the Collector to retain possession of the property unless and until Basdeo Gir establishes his title in a regular suit brought against Preetam Gir. On the other hand, if section 5 of Act XX of 1863 does not apply at all and the District Judge has no jurisdiction to proceed under that section, then, in our opinion, the order dated the 14th of December 1917 passed by him would be without jurisdiction and Basdeo Gir will have to be allowed to retain possession of this property unless a suit is brought against him for his dismissal or dispossession Pending the enquiry by the learned District Judge we think it would be advisable that the Collector should remain in possession of the estate as he at present is. We allow the application to set aside the order of the District Judge dated the 14th of December 1917 and remand this case to his Court for disposal according to law. Costs of this revision shall abide the event.

SUKHPAL KUAR v. DASU.

Messrs. Mohammad Siddiq and H. K. Ghosh, for the Appellant in Appeals Nos. 43 and 59.

Messrs. Aditya Prasad and Bishambhar Dayal, for Respondent No. 2 in Appeal No. 43.

Mr. Aditya Prasad, for the Respondent in Appeal No. 59.

JUDGMENT.—These appeals arise out of two suits, one of which was brought by Ganga Din and the other by Sarju, his son, and Dasu, the son of his sister, for the recovery of moneys due on certain deeds of mortgage and further charge, purporting to have been executed by Sheoraj Singh, Israj Singh, Sheodarshan Singh and Sridat Singh on different dates. Israj Singh has since paid off his share of the mortgage moneys and has not consequently been made a party to these suits.

One of the mortgages in suit was executed on the 24th October 1905. Another was executed on the 14th November 1905. After the execution of these mortgage-deeds Sheoraj Singh set apart 7 plots of land, measuring 11 bighas 11 biswas 3 biswansis and yielding a profit of Rs. 150 per year, for the maintenance of his wife, Musammat Sukhpal Kuar, and granted the same to her for her life without any power of transfer, subject to the condition that she was to remain in possession of the same rent-free and enjoy their profits and that they were to revert to him and his heirs after her death. A document evidencing the said grant was executed and registered by him on the 27th June 1907. A few months later he executed a lease, replacing the previous grant by another grant of 44 plots of cultivated land, measuring 250 bighas 2 biswas 2 biswansis, subject to the payment of Rs. 50 per year as rent to him. This lease was executed on the 6th September 1907 and empowered the lessee to hold the plots leased in perpetuity with full rights of sale, mortgage and disposal and gave no power to the lessor or his heirs either to terminate the lease or to claim any rent in excess of what was entered in the lease. The deeds of further charge were executed thereafter but no mention of the perpetual lease aforesaid is made in those deeds. On the other hand the mortgagors described therein the property mortgaged as still in their possession and ownership.

The deeds of mortgage and further charge do not cover the entire share of the mortgagors: but the effect of the perpetual lease was to reduce the value of the mortgaged property so far as the share of Sheoraj Singh was concerned very materially and to render that share liable for the payment of revenue in respect of the land comprised in the lease and to reduce thereafter the income which the lessor used to derive from Rs. 395.0.9 to Rs. 50 per year.

The learned Subordinate Judge held that the said lease was executed by Sheoraj Singh to defraud his creditors and was not binding on the plaintiffs. The lessee disputes the correctness of that finding, but it is admitted by Sheoraj Singh, who was examined by the lessee as her witness, that he had executed the lease in question to save property from being seized for the debts that existed prior to the lease. The other circumstances established go to support the same view. Sheoraj Singh states that the property mortgaged by him to the plaintiffs was worth Rs. 8,000 to Rs. 25,000 excluding the land comprised in the lease, and that he was indebted to the extent of Rs. 26,000 when he executed that lease. He further admits that the land leased was worth Rs. 5,000 and that some of it was worth a rental of Rs. 8, some of Rs. 10 and some of Rs. 12 per bigha. Musammat Sukhpal Kuar states in her evidence that she has been realising the rent of the land granted to her since the date of the lease and that one of the tenants, who cultivated 13, bighas 10 biswas 9 biswansis out of the said land from before and has been paying rent to her was Ganga Din himself. She has produced Debi Dayal in support of her statement and has filed counterfoils of certain receipts granted by her. Debi Dayal asserts that Ganga Din has been paying rent to the lady and that the receipts used to be written by the lady herself. But Sheoraj Singh deposes that his wife was pardanashin and did her management through some servants. Gur Prasad, the patwari of the village, has also been examined by her. He states that the lady does not observe parda from him and that she receives rents direct from the tenants and at times

Debi Dayal collects rents for her, but Debi Dayal does not say that he has been doing so.

Assuming, however, that Ganga Din has been paying the rent of some of the plots which he cultivated from before to the lady, that fact is not sufficient to bring home to him a knowledge of the contents of the lease in question. She was granted some land for her maintenance before without any power of transfer; and if Ganga Din paid any rent to her, it would be unreasonable to suppose that he did so knowing that she held a lease in perpetuity which conferred on her under-proprietary rights in derogation of the mortgage held by him. There was no reason, moreover, for Sheoraj Singh to have granted over 250 bighas of land to his wife in under-proprietary right yielding over Rs. 345 per annum exclusive of the rent for which the lease made her liable, if only a few months earlier a guzara grant, yielding a profit of Rs. 150 per year free of rent and limited for her life, was considered sufficient. Sheoraj Singh has truly stated that his object in granting the lease in question was merely to save the property from the hands of his creditors. The lease cannot, therefore, be regarded otherwise than fraudulent within the meaning of section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882) and unenforceable against the creditors so intended to be defrauded.

There was undoubtedly a moral obligation on Sheoraj Singh to look after the maintenance of his wife, but as pointed out in Mathews v. Feaver (1), transfers founded on what is designated good or meritorious consideration, such as natural love and affection, while creating as they do a moral as distinguished from a legal obligation, do not count as transfers for consideration, but are looked upon as merely voluntary. Such voluntary transfers are not transfers in good faith and for value, to which the law extends protection, if fraud is meditated or if the necessary effect of those transfers is to perpetrate a fraud on third parties. The lady was not probably unaware that her husband was indebted, for she admits that there was some debt which had swollen up on account of interest. A mere ex post facto submission to what has already taken place, not amounting to a ratification, does not, moreover, amount to an estoppel, for the submission cannot change the past.

As regards Sarju and Dasu, there is no sufficient evidence to show that they had paid any rent. If the lease was fraudulent and invalid, it was as ineffectual as regards the previous mortgages as it would be as regards the deeds of further charge subsequently executed.

The appeals, therefore, fail and are dismissed with costs.

Appeals dismissed.

The plaintiff, Nur Khan, claimed to recover a sum of Rs. 400 from Abbas and Ghazi, father of Abbas, on the allegation that Musammat Bibi Jan, daughter of his uncle Said Khan, had been married to him in Kohat District but had subsequently been abducted by the defendant Abbas, who had gone through a ceremony of marriage with her. He, therefore, claimed a sum of Rs. 400 on three grounds, firstly, as compensation for losing his wife; as bride price due to the nearest male relative of Musammat Bibi Jan, which compensation is known as rogha; and thirdly, because Musammat Bibi Jan had lived since her father's death in his house at his expense.

The first Court found that Musammat Bibi Jan had been betrothed to Nur Khan plaintiff, but had never married him, that she was 19 years of age and had been living in plaintiff's father's house whence she had been removed by her elder sister, Musammat Khan Bibi and married to the defendants Abbas. It found that there was a universal custom amongst these Pathans that if a woman, whether virgin, married or widow is abducted without the consent of her nearest male relative or guardian, the abductor is by custom in any case liable to pay a sum of money to that relative or guardian. It found that the customary sum was certainly not less than Rs 400, the amount claimed, but that in this case Abbas and his father had paid Rs. 120 to Musammat Khan Bibi leaving a balance of Rs. 280 to which the plaintiff was entitled. The Munsif remarked in his judgment as follows:—

"As prima facie it can be presumed that it is improper to receive compensation for a girl or a woman, yet this custom prevails in this tribe. In view of the mode of living of this tribe, too, it is necessary to receive the said rogha. Generally the male members remain abroad on service. Their women folk remain at their homes. If virgin daughters, married women and widows be abducted with impunity, it will give rise to a disturbance in almost all the villages of Narrah and no woman will remain abad in her house. Shah Rahman v. Ismail Khan (1) supports the view that it is not illegal to award compensation if the custom be proved."

The District Judge supported the decree, holding that the case was governed by the decision quoted above, and a second appeal has been preferred to this Court

It was objected at first that inasmuch as the claim in the Munsif's Court was not excluded from the jurisdiction of a Court of Small Causes, hence no second appeal was competent, but we consider that in the plaint as laid in which the plaintiff's marriage was alleged, the suit was so excluded under clause (h) of Article 35 of the Schedule to the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act and, therefore, a second appeal can be maintained.

The existence of the custom of rogha has been questioned in the appeal but we agree with both the Courts below that the evidence as to the existence of this custom is overwhelming and that by the custom of the tribe Nur Khan, although not yet a major, would be entitled to receive rogha from any person who married Musammat Bibi Jan without his consent.

It is also urged that in his plaint he alleged his own marriage to Musammat Bibi Jan. This is no doubt true, but it is not the only ground on which compensation was claimed.

The real question that arises is whether the claim can be enforced by law in the circumstances of the present case. Musammat Bibi Jan has attained the age of 19 years,

(1) 82 P. R. 1904.

She is sui uris and by her personal law she is entitled to enter into a contract of marriage, with any man of her own religion whom she may select. There is, besides, no legal bar to Abbas entering into a contract of marriage with Musammat Bibi Jan. There is, therefore, no question of a criminal offence having been committed nor of any actionable wrong under the ordinary Civil Law of India. The nature of the custom set up is touched upon at page 56 of the Gazetteer of the Attock District, where it is remarked that "all tribes, except the Pathans of Makhad Ilaqa and Attock, repudiated any custom of bride price, although as will be seen, marriage everywhere involves both families in much expense." The subject is, however, treated at some length in the Settlement Report of the Kohat District at pages 76 to 79. In paragraph 162 it is said that no womar, whether spinster or widow, whatever her age, is able to marry without the consent in the first case of her own male relations, in the second case of her deceased husband's heirs. Anyone marrying her without the consent of her guardian is made to pay a heavy fine as damages to the latter. This fine is as heavy as in a case of adultery, being about Rs. 300. It is known as sharmana or rasm mulk A son gets sharmana on his mother's re marriage; a nephew for his aunt; a husband for his wife. It is surprising what large sums are paid in this way. A man seducing a spinster or widow is treated just as if he had debauched a married woman. He may get her in marriage, but he must pay up first. All cases of this sort are by local custom considered as affording fair grounds for a blood feud." In paragraph 154 Mr. Tucker makes a general remark that the customs of the Pathan population of this district as regards women are barbarous in the extreme. Women are looked upon as cattle, to be bought and sold. He goes on to point out that the injury to the relatives of an abducted female is a matter for blood feud and that compensation is the only alternative. Now in Shah Rahman v. Ismail Khan (1) the question was whether a promise to pay a sum of money as compensation for the abduction of a woman is enforceable, as not being immoral or opposed to public policy, having regard to the terms of section 23 of the Contract Act. The decision was that if the abduction did not constitute a non compoundable offence, then a promise to pay compensation for the act done was enforceable by suit, from which it may be concluded that the Court did not regard the consideration as unlawful. The facts of that case do not clearly appear, but the present claim is one for recovery of bride price, pure and simple, and is not based on any agreement whatever. It is merely a claim for compensation for loss of a chattel or for the plaintiff's abstaining from committing an illegal act, that is to say, abstaining from any attempt to murder or otherwise injure the defendant. It cannot be said that either the Civil Law of India or the Personal Law of Islam recognises a person or a woman who is sui juris as being a chattel for the loss of which a relative can claim compensation. It is obvious that no claim is maintainable which is brought on the open or implied ground that the consideration is the plaintiff's abstaining from an illegal act. It may be that if a man elopes with a woman and voluntarily agrees to compensate her relatives for the injury which in general opinion has been done to them, that agreement may be enforceable, but it does not follow that the law will fasten any such liability upon him unless he has by his own act voluntarily undertaken it.

In a Full Bench decision of the Madras High Court reported as Kalavagunta Venkata Kristnayya v. Kalavagunta Lakshmi Narayana (2) it was held that a contract to make a payment to a father in consideration of his giving his daughter in marriage is to be regarded as immoral and opposed to public policy within the meaning of section 23 of the Indian Contract Act. The Full Bench remarked that if the point were not covered by authority, they would have no hesitation in holding that such agreements for payment to a father in consideration of his giving his daughter in marriage, are immoral and opposed to public policy, whether the question be approached from the standpoint of Hindu Law or of justice, equity and good conscience. In my opinion the Courts of this country are not bound to enforce a payment by a person who has performed an act which he was legally entitled to perform and which does not expose him to any contractual liability, because by a barbarous custom the alternative is the enmity of the relatives of the bride which is likely to take the form of attempts upon his life. He may be well advised to comply with the custom, but if he does not do so I do not think that under the Law of India he can be compelled to do so.

I would, therefore, accept the appeal.

SCOTT-SMITH, J.—I fully agree with all that my brother Dundas has written. I consider that the custom sought to be enforced in the present case is immoral. To enforce such a custom would be tantamount to saying that a woman of full age cannot marry a man unless the latter pays a large sum, which it may be impossible for him to do, to her nearest male relative. It would be a custom in restraint of marriage and opposed to the principle of section 26 of the Contract Act. The appeal is, therefore, accepted and the decree of the lower Courts being set aside the suit is dismissed, but under all the circumstances of the case I would leave the parties to bear their own costs throughout.

I concur in the proposed order as to costs.

Appeal accepted.

Mesne profits during pendency of suit, whether can be claimed in suit—Suit, nature of—Transfer of suit to Court having higher pecuniary jurisdiction, effect of.

A person who sues for the recovery of possession can in the same suit recover mesne profits which have accrued before the suit and also which have accrued pending the litigation, and in enforcing this latter claim he is continuing one and the same suit. The fact that the relief on this part of the claim amounts to a sum exceeding the pecuniary jurisdiction of the Court, merely involves a transfer of the proceedings to a Court of higher jurisdiction and does not amount to an interruption so as to make the subsequent proceedings in the higher Court a different suit. [p. 171, cols. 1 & 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Bankura, dated the 26th of March 1918, modifying that of the Subordinate Judge of that District, dated the 12th of September 1916.

Babu Porunamoy Bose, for the Appellant.

Babus Dwarka Nath Chakravarti and Phanindra Nath Das, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal against a decree for mesne profits. The only question that has been argued before us is whether the plaintiff's claim should not have been dismissed on the ground that it is barred by limitation.

In order to understand how this point arises it is necessary to state the dates and history of the litigation. On the 21st September 1908 the father of the present plaintiffs sued the defendants to recover possession of certain lands valued at Rs. 1,100 and claimed also mesne profits valued at Rs. 5 for the period before the suit from the date of the alleged dispossession, about two months prior to the suit, and also for the subsequent period until delivery of possession under the decree which the plaintiffs might obtain. On the 31st March 1910 the plaintiffs obtained a decree for khas possession and mesne profits up to the delivery of possession. Against this decision the defendants appealed unsuccessfully both to the District Judge and to the High Court and their appeal in the latter Court was dismissed on the 27th March 1914. In the meantime the plaintiffs had taken out execution of their decree of possession and possession had been delivered to them on the 6th July 1911. Subsequent to the delivery of possession the plaintiffs applied for assessment of mesne profits for the period they were out of possession and valued these mesne profits at Rs. 5,582 15 annas. This application was made to the Munsif in whose Court the suit had been tried, and on the 27th May 1912 the Munsif came to a decision that he had no jurisdiction to entertain this application as it exceeded his pecuniary jurisdiction. The Munsif in passing this order directed that the plaint should be returned to the plaintiffs and in so doing followed the procedure prescribed in the case of Bhupendra Kumar Chakravarti v. Purna Chandra Bose (1). As the records of the case were in the High Court on account of the appeal, the plaint could not be returned to the plaintiffs until the 5th December 1914. Ten days later on the 15th December 1914 the plaintiffs filed the original plaint and the application for mesne profits in the Court of the Subordinate Judge. In dealing with the question of limitation the lower Appellate Court has held that section 14 of the Limitation Act is applicable and prevented the plaintiffs' claim from being barred.

On behalf of the appellants reliance is placed on the decision of this Court in the case of Abhoya Churn Chuckerbutty v. Gour Mohun Dutt (2), in which it was held that in cases where the plaintiff had filed the plaint in a wrong Court, he was not entitled to exclude, when calculating the period of limitation, the time which elapsed after the order returning the plaint was passed and until the plaint was actually returned. Relying on this decision it is contended that in the present case the plaintiffs are not entitled to exclude from limitation the period between the 27th May 1912 when the Munsif held that the application must be made to another Court and the 15th December 1914 when the application in the Subordinate Judge's Court was filed.

In our opinion the contention of the learned Vakil for the respondents is correct, namely, that the question of the applicability of section 14 of the Limitation Act does not arise in this case. The law provides that when a person sues for recovery of possession, he can in the same suit recover mesne profits which have accrued before the suit and also which is exceptional, the mesne profits which have accrued pending the litigation, that is to say, can obtain relief on a cause of action which had not arisen when his plaint was filed. When the plaintiff proceeds to take advantage of this provision of the law and enforce his claim on his subsequent cause of action, he must be, we think, held to be continuing one and the same suit, The fact that on the subsequent cause of action the relief claimed by him amounts, owing to the action of the defendant, to a sum exceeding the pecuniary jurisdiction of the Court which decided the suit on the first cause of action, necessitates a transfer of the proceedings in the suit to a Court of higher jurisdiction, but it does not amount to an interruption so as to make the subsequent proceeding in the higher Court a different suit. Taking this view that the proceedings throughout are continuous, no question of limitation arises, as was pointed out in the Full Bench case of Puran Chand v. Roy Radha Kishen (3).

We must, therefore, affirm the decision of the lower Appellate Court though on different grounds, and dismiss this appeal with costs.

The mortgagee of an undivided share takes the security subject to the rights of the co-sharers of his mortgagor to obtain a partition, and if a partition be effected by the mortgagor and his co-sharers fairly and without fraud, and the mortgaged share is allotted to some other co-owner, the mortgagee is not entitled to enforce his security on the share so allotted. It is immaterial whether the partition is made by the Revenue Authorities, or by the Civil Court, or by arbitration, or by private arrangement, and it is not necessary that the mortgagee should be a party to the partition. If the partition is tainted with fraud or if in making the partition the encumbrance is taken into account and the partition is made subject to the encumbrance, the result will be different; but in the absence of fraud or the circumstance mentioned above, the mortgagee's remedy is against the share or property which the mortgagor has obtained under the partition. It makes no difference that before the partition is made the mortgagee obtains a decree for sale of the share mortgaged to him. [p. 173, cols. 1 & 2; p. 173, col. 2; p. 174, col. 1.]

First appeal from a decree of the First Additional Subordinate Judge, Aligarh.

Mr. Shiam Krishna Dar, for the Appellants.

Mr. N. C. Vaish, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI, J.—The question which arises in this appeal is a simple one but is by no means easy of solution.

The facts are these :—

On the 10th of February 1904 Hyder Shah executed a mortgage in favour of Lachhman Prasad, the predecessor in title of the plaintiffs, and among the property mortgaged was a share in the village of Hasanpur Ladauki the extent of which was two-fifths of 8/15. The present suit is for enforcement of this mortgage.

The property comprised in the mortgage originally belonged to Sardar Bahadur Mir Khan, who died on the 14th of June 1869 leaving considerable property and a large number of heirs, namely, eight sons, eight daughters and three widows. Among the sons were Hyder Shah aforesaid and Amir Mohammad Khan. The latter executed a mortgage on 7th March 1893 in favour of Sant Lal and Moti Lal in respect of several items of property, one of which was an eighth share in the aforesaid village of Hasanpur Ladauki. Sant Lal and Moti Lal brought a suit for sale on the basis of that mortgage and obtained a decree for sale on the 3rd of May 1901. In execution of this decree they caused a 24/ 92 share in Hasanpur Ladauki to be sold by auction on 20th July 1903 and themselves purchased it. Their widows sold that share to the defendants of the 4th party who, under a decree subsequently obtained, are in possession of a 14/192 share. Meanwhile, in 1896, Nur Begam, one of the widows of Sardar Bahadur Mir Khan, and Wazir Begam, one of his daughters, brought a suit for partition of their shares in the estate of Sardar Mir Khan against his other heirs and obtained a decree on the 17th of February 1898. This decree was made final on the 18th of July 1903, that is, two days before the auction sale held in execution of Sant Lal and Moti Lal's decree. Under this final decree which was passed after the death of Nur Begam, who appears to have died after the passing of the preliminary decree, the whole of the village Hasanpur Ladauki was allotted to the share of Nur Begam and Wazir Begam; and Hyder Shah, who was brought on the record as one of the legal representatives of Nur Begam, acquired a 1/5th share out of 8/15 in the aforesaid village. It is this share which he mortgaged to the plaintiffs' predecessor in title on the 10th of February 1904 and it is this share the sale of which is sought by the plaintiffs in enforcement of that mortgage.

The defendants of the 4th party objected to this part of the claim and urged that the 14/192 share purchased by them should be exempted from the decree on the ground that their vendors had already purchased it before the execution of the mortgage-deed of 10th February 1904 and Hyder Shah had no title in respect of it at the date of the mortgage.

The Court below has accepted this contention and exempted a 14/192 share in the village of Hasanpur Ladauki from the claim. The plaintiffs dispute the correctness of this part of the lower Court's decision and have preferred this appeal. The only question which we have to decide is whether Amir Mohammad owned the above-mentioned share at the date of the auction sale at which the vendors of the defendants of the 4th party purchased it and whether they validly acquired that share. If they did so, Hyder Shah was not competent to mortgage it and the plaintiffs are not entitled to have it sold.

It must be borne in mind that when Amir Mohammad mortgaged a 1/8th undivided share in the village he did not own that share, as his father was alive. It was only after the death of his father that he acquired a share in the village as one of his heirs. The extent of the share so acquired was less than that mortgaged. By virtue of section 43 of the Transfer of Property Act, the mortgage in favour of Sant Lal and Moti Lal operated on the share acquired by the mortgagor. It is probable that the mortgagees were aware of the fact that Sardar Bahadur Mir Khan was alive at the date of the mortgage and that his son, the mortgagor, had no share in the property. If this were so, it would be difficult for the mortgagees to invoke in aid the provisions of section 43. There is, however, no evidence on the record that they had knowledge of the absence of their mortgagor's title, and the fact remains that they obtained a decree for the sale of the share mortgaged to them, and the Court which passed the decree must be deemed to have accepted the position that the mortgage attached to the share.

It is now settled law that the mortgagee of an undivided share takes the security subject to the rights of the co-sharers of his mortgagor to obtain a partition, and if a partition be effected by the mortgagor and his co-sharers fairly and without fraud, and the mortgaged share is allotted to some other co-owner, the mortgagee is not entitled to enforce his security on the share so allotted. The leading case on the point is that of Bynath Lall v. Ramoodeen Chowdry (1), decided by their Lordships of the Privy Council. The principle laid down in this ruling was followed in a number of cases, many of which are cited on page 318 of Shepherd and Brown's Edition of the Transfer of Property Act (7th Edition). It is immaterial whether the partition was made by the Revenue Authorities, or by the civil Court, or by arbitration, or by private arrangement, and it is not necessary that the mortgagee should have been a party to the partition. It is one of the incidents of a mortgage of an undivided share that the mortgagee cannot follow his security into the hands of a co sharer of the mortgagor who has obtained the mortgaged share upon partition. Of course, if the partition is tainted with fraud or if in making the partition the encumbrance was taken into account and the partition was made subject to the encumbrance, the result will be different; but in the absence of fraud or the circumstance mentioned above, the mortgagee's remedy is against the share or property which the mortgagor has obtained under the partition. In the present case there is no suggestion of fraud or unfairness, nor is it alleged that in the partition which took place regard was had to the mortgage in favour of Sant Lal and Moti Lal. Therefore, those mortgagees were not entitled to enforce their mortgage on the village of Hasanpur Ladauki which under the final decree for partition was allotted to the shares of Nur Begam and Wazir Begam alone. The difficulty which arises in this case is due to the fact that a decree for sale had already been passed in favour of the mortgagees before the date of the final decree for partition, and it is urged that the Court executing the decree could not go behind it and sell property which the decree had not directed to be sold. After giving the matter my best consideration I think that this argument is untenable. If before the actual auction sale the property sold had ceased to be the property of the mortgagor and had become the property of his co-sharers, and the latter had acquired it free from the mortgage, the share so acquired could not be sold under the mortgage and the fact of a decree having been obtained by the mortgagee against the mortgagor cannot affect the interests obtained by the co sharers under the partition. Where property has devolved on a third person by operation of law, and the decree for sale is not binding on him, the existence of the decree and a sale in pursuance of it cannot convey his rights to the purchaser at the sale. As before the actual sale in the present case Amir Muhammad Khan had ceased to own any share in the village of Hasanpur Ladauki it could not be sold as his property and the purchasers did not acquire any share in that village. Hyder Shah was, therefore, competent to mortgage the share which he inherited from his mother, Nur Begam, and the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree for the sale of that share.

It is urged that the final decree for partition was an invalid decree having been passed by the Civil Court. I do not think this is a valid contention. The decree has been submitted to by all the co-sharers, and it would not be unreasonable to regard the partition as one made by the co-sharers themselves. Such a partition would have the same effect as a partition made by a Court.

For the above reasons I am of opinion that Hyder Shah was competent to mortgage the share in question and that the Court below was wrong in exempting it from the claim. I would accordingly allow the appeal, and varying the decree of the Court below make a decree for the sale of 14/192 share in Hasanpur Ladauki in addition to the other property ordered by that Court to be sold. The appellants will have their costs of this appeal. The defendants of the 4th party should be allowed six months from this date for payment of the mortgage-money.

SULAIMAN, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit for sale on foot of a mortgage deed. The facts of this case which are sufficient to explain the points which arise for determination in the appeal may be briefly stated as follows:—One Sardar Bahadur Mir Khan was the owner of considerable property including 19-biswas share in village Hasanpur Ladauki. He had three wives, eight sons and eight daughters. On the 7th March 1889 one of his sons, Amir Mohammad, during the lifetime of his father mortgaged a one-eighth share in Mauza Hasanpur Ladauki along with other properties to Sant Lal and Moti Lal. It is admitted that at the time of this mortgage Amir Mohammad had no interest in this village at all. His father, however, died soon after. Amir Mohammad and two of his brothers then mortgaged the whole of the 19 biswas share in village Hasanpur Ladauki to the Bank of Upper India, which obtained a preliminary decree for sale in 1895. After this in 1896 Nur Begam, one of the widows, and Wazir Begam, one of the daughters, instituted a suit for recovery of their share in the estate of the Sardar Bahadur by partition, and they made the Bank of Upper India a party, but not Sant Lal and Moti Lal. A preliminary decree for partition was passed on the 17th February 1898 and this was followed by a final decree for partition on the 18th of July 1903. Under this latter decree the whole of the village Hasanpur Ladauki, along with other property, was allotted to Wazir Begam and the heirs of Nur Begam. Hyder Shah, one of the sons of Nur Begam, mortgaged the share inherited by him from his mother to Lachman Prasad, whose representatives are the present plaintiffs.

In the meantime, in the year 1900, Sant Lal and Moti Lal had instituted a suit for sale on foot of their mortgage-deed of 1889 against Amir Mohammad, making the Bank of Upper India also a party. Although the trial Court held that the mortgage of the properties belonging to the Sardar Bahadur was perfectly void, and as there was no allegation even of erroneous representation, much less proof of it, section 43 of the Transfer of Property Act did not help the mortgagees, it nevertheless passed a decree for sale, directing that the Bank should have priority as regards the properties mortgaged to it. After this Sant Lal and Moti Lal obtained a final decree for sale, and then purchased at auction one-eighth share in Hasanpur Ladauki on the 20th of July 1903 and subsequently their widows transferred the same to the defendants 4th party, who are the contesting respondents in this appeal.

The defendants 4th party have, under a decree for possession, recovered 14 sihams out of 192 in the 19-biswas share and claimed its exemption from the present claim. The learned Subordinate Judge has exempted this share, holding that Sant Lal and Moti Lal were entitled to the benefit of section 43 and could hold the share inherited by Amir Mohammad from his father liable for their mortgage money, and he has further held that inasmuch as Sant Lal and Moti Lal had previously obtained a decree for sale, the partition decree could not affect their rights.

In the grounds of appeal to this Court the finding of the Court below on the question of the erroneous representation by Amir Mohammad and the applicability of section 43, Transfer of Property Act, have not been challenged, and I am, therefore, not prepared to allow that question to be re-opened, especially as it is a mixed question of law and fact.

The second question raised in this appeal is by no means free from difficulty. The partition suit and the mortgage suit were going on side by side and independently of each other. The final decree for sale was passed before the final decree for partition, but the auction-sale took place subsequent to the partition decree. Was the mortgage-decree subject to the partition decree or was it the reverse? To answer this question it will be necessary to consider the principles governing the rights of co-owners in joint property.

When a property is joint and undivided and belongs to a number of co-sharers, every such co sharer has a right to joint possession of it together with an inherent right to enforce a partition and get his share divided off from the rest. His right to a severance of his share by partition must, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, always exist, as he cannot against his will be compelled to hold the property in common.

There can, of course, be no objection to his transferring his undivided share even before partition. Such transferee will acquire his right to joint possession, coupled with the right to enforce a partition and saddled with the liability to have his own share partitioned off by the other co-sharers. When, therefore, a mortgagee takes a mortgage of an undivided share of a co-sharer, he takes it subject to the right of the other co-sharers to enforce a partition in spite of his mortgage. This is a necessary result of the very incidents of joint ownership. The effect of the partition is simply to substitute a definite and separate part for an undivided share in the joint whole, and thereby to transfer the lien to that portion which the mortgagor has obtained in substitution of what he had mortgaged. It was the right and interest of the mortgagor in the whole estate which had been mortgaged, and if after partition his right, instead of being represented by an undivided share in the whole, comes to be represented by a separate and divided share, the charge ought to attach to this separated share.

In the leading case of Byjnath Lall v. Ramoodeen Chowdry (1), which set at rest the previous conflict of opinion, their Lordships of the Privy Council laid down that the owner of an undivided share has power to pledge his own undivided share, "but he cannot, by so doing, affect the interest of the other sharers in them, and that the persons who took the security took it subject to the right of those sharers to enforce a partition and thereby to convert what was an undivided share of the whole into a defined portion held in severalty." If a mortgagee assented to a partition which had been fairly and conclusively made, it could not be doubted "that the mortgagee of the undivided share of one co sharer, who has no privity of contract with the other co-sharers, would have no recourse against the lands allotted to such co-sharers; but must pursue his remedy against the lands allotted to his mortgagor, and as against him, would have a charge on the whole of such lands. He would take the subject of the pledge in the new form which it had assumed." The mortgagee being "content to accept what has been allotted in substitution of the undivided interest as the fair enquivalent of it, their Lordships are of opinion that not only he has a right to do so, but that this, in the circumstances of the case, was his sole right, and that he could not successfully have sought to charge any other parcel of the estate in the hands of any of the former co-sharers. There is, therefore, no question here of election, or of the time when the election was made."

The same principle, though in a different form, is embodied in section 44 of the Transfer of Property Act, which gives to the transferee of an undivided share the transferor's right to joint possession or other common or part enjoyment of the property, as well as the right to enforce a partition of the same, but also subject to the conditions and liabilities affecting the share transferred. And the same principle has been consistently followed in all cases where subsequent to the mortgage of an undivided share, the mortgagor's share has been divided off by a partition, which was fair and without fraud, the Courts holding that the mortgagee's only remedy was to proceed against the new form which the equity of redemption has assumed.

In Hem Chunder Ghose v. Thako Moni Debi (2) a co-owner had mortgaged his undivided share in certain land which had been jointly held with another; and subsequently to the mortgage, by a decree in a partition suit to which the mortgagee was not a party, the mortgaged property was allotted to the other owner, other property in substitution being allotted to the mortgagor. In a suit by the mortgagee to recover the sum due on the mortgage by sale of the mortgaged property, it was held that the mortgagee could not proceed against the mortgaged property which had, on partition, been allotted to another, but that he should be allowed to proceed against that which had been allotted as substitute to the mortgagor.

BYUP SINGH v. CHEDDA SINGH.

In Amolak Ram v. Chandan Singh (3) one Naubat Ram mortgaged a 5-biswas share in village Muzaffra and other properties to Mukand and Munna, who were co-sharers in the village. In a partition between the mortgagor and the mortgagees, the mortgagor got other villages in substitution for his share in Muzaffra, and mortgaged them to subsequent mortgagees. The subsequent mortgagees in execution of their decree for sale purchased these other villages. The original mortgagees obtained a decree for sale of the 5-biswas share in Muzaffra and other properties and assigned the decree to one Lachmi, with a stipulation that he was not to proceed against Muzaffra. In a subsequent suit it was held that the villages purchased by the subsequent mortgagees were liable to be sold in execution of the decree on the first mortgage. The subsequent mortgagees, having paid up the whole amount, sued for contribution against Muzaffra. It was held that even apart from the fact that at the time of partition both parties to the mortgage had intended that the mortgage should not be enforced against Muzaffra, the old mortgage could not after the partition be enforced against the 5-biswas share in Muzaffra which had passed out of the share of the mortgagor, and that, therefore, there could be no claim for contribution against it

In Venkatarama Iyer v. Esumsa Rowthen (4) the defendant No. 1 had mortgaged to the plaintiff a decree in his favour and against defendants Nos. 2 to 9. Certain creditors of the defendant No. 1 attached the decree, but the defendant No. 1 executed his decree and realised the decretal amount, which was deposited in Court. The plaintiff sued to recover his mortgage money from the amount in deposit. It was held that "there are numerous authorities in support of the position that the mortgagee is entitled to a charge upon the property which through no fault of the mortgagee has taken the place of the mortgaged property."

In Muthia Raja v. Appala Raja (5) a son, who was living separate from his father and a brother, executed a mortgage of his $\frac{1}{3}$rd share; subsequent to this a private partition was effected between the father and the sons. The brother brought a suit for a declaration that the land allotted to him was free from the mortgage, and asked for possession. It was held that he was entitled to a decree for the declaration sought and for possession.

In Shahebzada Mahomed Kazim Shah v. R. S. Hills (6) it was conceded that after a partition has been effected against the mortgagor, the mortgagee is entitled to regard his mortgage as attaching to the property allotted to his mortgagor in substitution for the security on the mortgagor's undivided share in the property generally, and that the security is shifted, as the result of the partition, from the undivided share of the mortgagor on to the property directed to be conveyed to him under the decree. And it was further held that if the property allotted to the mortgagor under the partition decree is made subject to any charge, then such charge has priority over the mortgage.

In Hakim Lal v. Ram Lal (7) the same rule was applied, and Mookerji, J., in his elaborate judgment has illustrated in what manner the substituted security can be ascertained in case the partition decree leaves it undetermined.

The same rule has been laid down in a number of other cases reported in the various volumes of the Indian Cases which it is not necessary to enumerate.

It may, therefore, be taken to be a well-settled principle of law that after a partition the mortgagee's only remedy is to proceed against the substituted security and not to follow the original share mortgaged in the hands of the other co-sharers with whom he had no privity of contract. It has still to be considered whether the fact of the partition having taken place subsequent to the passing of a final decree for sale would make any difference. It was strongly contended on behalf of the respondents that the effect of the passing of a decree absolute for sale under the old section 89 of the Transfer of Property Act was to extinguish the mortgage security altogether, as provided by that section, and that the only remedy left to the mortgagee was to execute the decree as it stood. It was also contended that the execution Court would have no power to go behind the decree and direct the sale of property other than that mentioned in the decree. And it was pointed out that in cases where the mortgage was confined to only a fraction of the share of the mortgagor in the undivided estate, and there was nothing in the partition decree to fix the exact equivalent of that share, the execution Court may have to try almost a new partition suit in order to be able to ascertain the substituted equivalent of the share mortgaged.

In my opinion, if the effect of the partition is looked upon as converting what was an undivided share of the whole into a defined portion held in severalty, it will be manifest that the charge must shift on to the new substitute. Though the interest of the mortgagor gets transformed into a new form, it must nevertheless continue to be liable for the mortgage-debt.

The mortgage of an undivided share was subject to the rights of the other co sharers to enforce a partition and get their shares separated off How could their rights be affected in any way by the mere circumstance that the mortgagee has behind their backs obtained a decree for sale against his mortgagor? If a mortgagee, before he obtains a decree for sale, is bound to submit to a substitution of the mortgaged property effected by partition, he will have to do the same even after his decree. Of course, the same result may not follow in case of a foreclosure decree, or where the property has been sold away before partition, for in these cases the mortgagor would cease to have any interest at all at the time of the partition, and in order to make the partition effective the persons in whom the interest has become vested might have to be made parties. But so long as the equity of redemption remains in the mortgagor and has not passed out of his ownership, and the only right acquired by the mortgagee is to put to sale the undivided share of the mortgagor, a conversion of the mortgaged property would merely make the mortgage liability attach to the new substitute.

It is well known that the money or property given by Government in substitution for the lands taken up under the Land Acquisition Act is charged in favour of the mortgagee, who had his claim upon the property so taken. Similarly, the charge on the proceeds of sale of the mortgaged property for arrears of revenue or of rent is provided for by section 73 of the Transfer of Property Act. And the puisne mortgagee's claim to a charge on the surplus proceeds of a sale under a prior mortgage is well recognised. Again, in cases where under a Revenue Court partition new Mahals have been formed, execution Courts have often had to determine the equivalent of the mortgaged share, or ascertain its new nomenclature even though the identity of the mortgaged property remains unchanged. In all such cases the execution Court, strictly speaking has to go behind the letter of the decree, but in substance it is still executing the decree against the right and interest of the mortgagor in the mortgaged property which has assumed a new form.

I can well realize the difficulty which an execution Court may have to face in trying to ascertain the equivalent substitute of the mortgaged property, where the partition decree leaves it undetermined. But the difficulty is no less than what the original Court would have had to face if the question had arisen before the decree. It is merely the stage at which the inquiry is to be made that is altered, and not that the difficulty is enhanced in any way. I can conceive of endless difficulties that may arise, and great hardships to which mortgagees may be put, under certain circumstances. But if persons who take mortgages of undivided shares are sufficiently prudent and diligent and make inquiries about their mortgagor's interest before putting it up for sale, many of the difficulties will be easily avoided.

In this view of the law it is clear that when on the 20th of July 1903, a 1/8th share in Hasanpur Ladauki was put up for sale and purported to be sold as against Amir Mohammad, the latter had, in consequence of the previous partition decree, ceased to have any interest in that village at all. I am, therefore, constrained to hold that the mortgagor's right in that village having become extinguished, the auction-purchasers acquired no rights whatsoever. Their representatives, the defendants 4th party, cannot, therefore, resist the plaintiffs' claim based on a mortgage executed by one of the persons who obtained the partition decree.

By the Court.—The appeal is allowed, the decree of the Court below is varied and a decree is made in favour of the plaintiffs for the sale of 14/192 share in Hasanpur Ladauki, in addition to the property ordered by the Court below to be sold. The appellants will have their costs of this appeal.

The defendants of the 4th party are allowed six months from this date for payment of the mortgage money.

BHAGIRATH—Plaintiff—Appellant

NARAYAN—Defendant—Respondent.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXII, r. 7—Mortgage suit—Minor defendant—Decree on admission—Decree not made absolute—Mortgage, second, of suit property—Sanction of Court not obtained—Mortgage, whether void or voidable.

In a mortgage suit certain of the defendants were minors and the claim was admitted on their behalf by their guardians for the suit, and a preliminary decree for foreclosure was passed. The decree was not made absolute. The guardians of the minors then executed another mortgage of the same property in favour of the decree-holder in part payment of his decree and for the remainder executed a money bond, but this arrangement was not reported to the Court and the sanction of the Court was not obtained. Upon a suit on this mortgage one of the guardians admitted the mortgage while on behalf of the other there was a denial:

Held, that the mortgage was not void but merely voidable as against the person who contested it. [p 179, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Akola, dated the 19th February 1918, in Civil Appeal No. 90 of 1917.

Mr. V. R. Pandit, R. B., for the Appellant.

Mr. M. B. Niyogi, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The third and fourth defendants in this mortgage suit are subsequent transferees of the mortgaged property and we are not really concerned with them. The first two defendants, Narayan and Sakharam, are minor sons of Danji and Krishna who are brothers. After Danji's death Narayan's mother, Musammat Girja, acting on behalf of her son, and Sakharam's father Krishna executed a mortgage-deed in favour of the plaintiff Bhagirath Marwari on 21st March 1907 with a consideration of Rs. 800 in cash. Krishna died not long afterwards and in 1911 the plaintiff instituted a suit on his mortgage. The claim was admitted on behalf of the minors by their mothers acting as guardians for the suit, and a preliminary decree for foreclosure was passed on 18th October 1911 for a sum of Rs. 1,752-7-3. The time allowed for payment expired on 18th April 1912. On 7th June 1912 the conditional decree not having been made absolute, the mothers of the minors executed another mortgage-deed in favour of the decree holder for Rs. 1,500 which was in part payment of his mortgage decree. For the remainder along with other advances they executed a money-bond. This arrangement was never reported to the Court. Bhagirath Marwari has now sued on this second mortgage-bond.

Narayan's mother, Musammat Girja, has acted as his guardian throughout this suit. Sakharam's mother, Musammat Tani, however, refused to act for her son and the reader was appointed as his guardian. On Narayan's behalf his mother as guardian for the suit admitted the mortgage and the receipt of consideration and pleaded two re-payments of Rs. 205 each in addition to the one re-payment of the same amount admitted in the plaint. On behalf of Sakharam a general sweeping denial was made of every allegation in the plaint.

It has been held in both the lower Courts that the original mortgage suit was still pending when the mortgage now sued upon was executed, as no final decree had then been passed, and further that the execution of the mortgage now in suit was an agreement with reference to the suit then pending against the minors which, not having the sanction of the Court, is void. The contention that the original mortgage suit was no longer pending after the passing of the conditional decree therein is not tenable in the face of the decisions in Laxmi Bai v.

Ramchandra (1) and Vinayakrao Krishnarao v. Baijanath Saligram (2) and was withdrawn by the learned Counsel for the appellant. He further argued that the execution of the mortgage could not be called an agreement with reference to the suit within the meaning of rule 7 of Order XXXII of the Civil Procedure Code, but found himself unable to maintain this position. His final argument was that the agreement is merely voidable and not void and, therefore, the decree should have been granted against the first defendant Narayan who did not seek to avoid it in this suit. This is obviously sound, as the word used in the second clause of rule 7 is "voidable" and the plaintiffs are entitled to a mortgage decree against all the defendants other than Sakharam.

The second and third issues framed in the first Court were in respect of the two alleged re payments of Rs. 265 each and it was held that there was no proof of any re payment having been made. No finding on this point was given in the lower Appellate Court. Under section 103 of the Civil Procedure Code I find that the two re-payments pleaded were not made as no evidence whatever was given in regard to them.

The decree of the lower Appellate Court is accordingly set aside and a preliminary decree for foreclosure will be issued against the first, third and fourth defendants in the suit, allowing them time up to 31st October 1920 in which to redeem the mortgage. The amount due on the mortgage at the date of suit, calculating interest at $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. per mensem only, was Rs. 3,160-10-0. Interest on this amount at one per cent. per mensem from the date of suit to the date now fixed for payment is Rs. 1,102. The plaintiff is, however, limited to Rs. 3,000 by the rule of damdupat. The amount payable for redemption is also to include the costs incurred by the plaintiff in all three Courts, but he is to pay the costs of the minor Sakharam, and this must be deducted. The amount payable for redemption thus is Rs. 3,676-13-0.

PRIVY COUNCIL APPEAL No. 24 OF 1919.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 110—Appeal to Privy Council—Decree of lower Court confirmed in appeal - Appellant taking up new position in appeal to Privy Council—Certificate for leave to appeal, whether should be granted.

The value of the subject-matter in a suit exceeded Rs. 10,000, and the decision of the first Court was affirmed on appeal by the High Court. The appellant applied for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council, proposing in that appeal to take up a position that was not taken up in the argument of the appeal in the High Court:

Held, that the case was not a fit one for the grant of a certificate for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council. [p. 180, col. 1.]

The Hon'ble Mr. Motilal Nehru and Dr. S. N. Sen, for the Appellants.

The Hon'ble Dr. T. B. Sapru and Mr. Iqbal Ahmad, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council. The value of the property in dispute in the Court of first instance and also in the Court of Appeal was over Rs. 10,000, but the decree of this Court on appeal affirmed the decision of the Court below. It is, therefore, necessary for the applicants to show that some substantial question of law is involved or some question of general interest before leave can be given to them to appeal. The facts of the case are very clearly set forth in the judgment of this Court which is to be found in Maina Bibi v. Wasi Ahmad (1). It is urged before us that the second suit, that is the one out of which the present application has arisen, is barred by the rule of res judicata, that the former suit having been dismissed, no further suit will lie and that possession should not have been granted to the plaintiffs without their paying their share of the dower debt due at the date of the decree. No other point is pressed before us. So far as the rule of res judicata is concerned, an examination of the plaints in the two cases will show clearly that that rule has no application at all. In the present suit the plaintiffs came into Court with an entirely different cause of action. In the former suit the rights of the parties were defined and the plaintiffs were given the option of paying the amount due at that time and taking possession. There is nothing in that decision to bar a fresh suit when fresh circumstances have arisen. So far as the plea is taken that possession should not be granted without payment of the dower-debt or a proportionate part thereof, the only basis on which this plea was placed when the appeal was argued in this Court was that the widow, in transferring the complete ownership of the property, might be said to have transferred her right to the dower debt and her right to possession, this being a lesser right which was included in the larger right that she transferred. Before us it is sought to base this plea on the fact that there are decisions that as long as a Muhammadan widow is alive, no matter how she may deal with it, the heirs cannot demand possession from her or her transferees so long as they do not pay their proportionate share of the dower-debt, and reference is made to certain old decisions of this Court with a view to showing that there is really a substantial question of law for decision and also a question of general interest. In view of the fact that this is not the position that was taken up in the argument at the hearing of this appeal in this Court, we do not think that it should be allowed to be taken up now. In our opinion this is not a fit case for leave to be granted and the application is, therefore, disallowed with costs including fees on the higher scale.

Application disallowed.

In a suit brought upon a mortgage the amount due is calculated only up till the due date fixed in the preliminary decree, and in the Civil Procedure Code there is no provision by which a suit for an amount which became due after the due date should not be realisable in a subsequent suit. [p. 181, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decision of the District Judge, Monghyr.

Messrs. Purnendu Narain Sinha, Ram Lal Dutt and Netai Chander Ghosh, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

COUTTS, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought for recovery of a sum of Rs. 2,000 due on account of rent of a house. The suit was decreed in the Court of first instance, but on appeal to the District Judge the decree has been set aside and the suit has been dismissed.

The facts of the case are as follows:—The house originally belonged to one A. C. Biswas. He died leaving him surviving his widow and a son Abilash Chandra Biswas. The shares of the widow and Abilash were respectively $\frac{1}{3}$rd and $\frac{2}{3}$ d. In May 1902, Abilash and his mother executed a mortgage in favour of the defendant in the suit, Brajo Gopal Mukerji, for Rs. 4,500. In July of the same year they executed an ekrarnama whereby they agreed that Brajo Gopal Mukharji should remain in possession of the house on payment of a rent of Rs. 50, out of which were to be paid Municipal taxes and khas mahal rent and the balance was to be set off against the interest on the loan. Subsequently Abilash sold his $\frac{2}{3}$rds share to the plaintiff in the suit, Tara Chand Marwari. Tara Chand thereupon became entitled to $\frac{2}{3}$rds and the widow of A. C. Biswas to $\frac{1}{3}$rd share in the house. On the 2nd of November 1905 Brajo Gopal brought a suit on his mortgage bond and on the 22nd of December 1906 an order for a preliminary decree in favour of the plaintiff was passed. Against this there was an appeal to the High Court; that appeal, however, was dismissed and the order of the trial Court confirmed. On the 22nd of September 1910 the preliminary decree was drawn up. Against this preliminary decree there was another appeal to the High Court. The result of this appeal was that the High Court confirmed the decision of the Subordinate Judge and directed that an account should be taken up till the due date, which was the 23rd of March 1913. An account was accordingly taken up till the date and a decree passed accordingly. On the 24th of September 1915 the final decree was passed.

The period for which Tara Chand was claiming in this suit from Brajo Gopal is a period subsequent to the 23rd of March 1913, which was the due date of payment fixed by the High Court. As I have already said, the suit was decreed in the Court of first instance but has been dismissed on appeal on the preliminary ground that the suit does not lie because Tara Chand should have made his claim for the rent (which he is now claiming) at the time of the passing of the final decree. Under the provisions of Order XXXIV, rules 2, 3, 4 and 5, it is clear that in a suit brought upon a mortgage the amount due is calculated only up till the due date fixed in the preliminary decree, and in the Civil Procedure Code there is no provision by which a suit for an amount which became due after the due date should not be realisable in a subsequent suit; nor is there any authority for this proposition except the case of Kashi v. Bajrangi Prasad (1). This was a decision of a single Judge and it purports to be based on the decision of Vinayak Shivarao Dighe v. Dattatraya Gopal (2). This decision, however, is no authority for the decision in the Allahabad case (1) for in that case the appellate decree was dated the 2nd of September 1895 and by it the original decree was amended by substituting Rs. 9,809.9 9 for Rs. 8,200 in the decree and it was directed that six months' time was to run from this date, that is to say, the 2nd of September 1895. Nothing was said as to the profits from 1894 to the date of payment of Rs. 9,809-9-9, and it was to recover those mesne profits that the suit was brought, that is to say, the suit was brought to recover mesne profits for a period not only before the due date but before the date of the decree.

This is an altogether different case from the present case, which is to recover rent for a period subsequent to the due date, and we have direct authority for the proposition, that such a suit can be brought, in Sakari Datta v. Ainuddy (3). That was a suit for mesne profits for a period intervening between the date fixed for redemption in the decree and the date of actual delivery of possession, and it was held that the suit was maintainable. In this case in the course of his judgment Mookerji, J., remarked: "In our opinion there is no room for reasonable doubt that a suit for these mesne profits is maintainable. The test to be applied is whether the sum now claimed could have been recovered by the mortgagor in the previous suit for redemption." As in that case so in the case now before us the answer must obviously be in the negative. In the present case according to the terms of the preliminary decree no account could have been taken for the rent which might have accrued after the due date, that is the 23rd of March 1913.

In my opinion the suit is clearly maintainable. I would accordingly set aside the judgment and decree of the learned Subordinate Judge and would remand the appeal for re hearing on the merits. Costs will abide the result.

This decision will also govern Second Appeals Nos. 1393 and 1399 of 1918.

A mere error of law by an Appellate Court does not afford to the defeated party a right to apply for revision under section 115 of the Civil Procedure Code.

A suit by a Mukhtar to recover a sum of money on account of work done is maintainable and does not offend against the provisions of section 28 of the Legal Practitioners Act.

Civil revision against the order of the Subordinate Judge, Moradabad, dated the 14th February 1919.

Mr. M. L. Sandal, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Mr. Narayan Prasad Ashthana, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This was a suit brought by a Mukhtar for services rendered by him to the defendant as a Mukhtar in a criminal case which was pending against the defendant. He stated that his fee for attendance in the Court was Rs. 20 a day besides travelling expenses; that he had received Rs. 40 and that a balance of Rs. 95 was due. The defendant disputed the claim mainly on the ground that it offended against the provisions of section 28 of the Legal Practitioners Act. The Court of first instance overruled this objection and held that the suit was one for work done and made a decree in the plaintiff's favour for Rs. 50, which it held to be reasonable remuneration for the work done by the plaintiff for the defendant. This decree has been affirmed by the lower Appellate Court. The present application is one for revision of the decree of the lower Appellate Court, on the ground that that decree is erroneous inasmuch as the learned Judge of that Court did not give effect to the provisions of section 28 of the Legal Practitioners Act. The application purports to have been made under section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In my opinion the application is not maintainable under that section. There was no question of jurisdiction and it cannot be said that the Court acted illegally in the matter of its jurisdiction. That an appeal lay to the lower Appellate Court can admit of no doubt and it cannot be disputed that it had jurisdiction to hear the appeal. If in deciding the appeal and in exercise of its jurisdiction it has committed an error of law, that would not afford to the defeated party a right to apply for revision under section 115. Furthermore, the decisions of the Courts below are in accordance with the view held by this Court in Raghunath Saran Singh v. Sri Ram (1). The suit was one for work done and has been rightly treated by the Court below as such. I dismiss the application with costs.

That an ex parte decree was obtained by perjured evidence is no ground for setting it aside. [p. 183, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decision of the District Judge, Patna.

Messrs. Fakhruddin and Harihar B. Singh, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Kuluant Sahai and Jal Gobind Prasad Singh, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit instituted by the respondent against the appellant to set aside an ex parte decree obtained by the appellant against the respondent on 23rd June 1915 in money Suit No. 22 of 1915. That suit was for recovery of rent from May 1911 to 15th April 1914 at the rate of Rs. 8 a month. It is not suggested that there was any contrivance by the appellant by which the respondent was prevented from placing his case before the Court. As a matter of fact, the respondent entered appearance in the rent suit and filed his written statement. When the case was called on for hearing, he applied for adjournment, and when his application was refused he withdrew from the case, with the result that an ex parte decree was passed against him. The question at once arises whether the present suit is maintainable, having regard to the fact that the respondent was not prevented by any fraud on the part of the appellant from placing his case before the Court.

The learned Judge thought that he was at liberty to examine the evidence in the record for the purpose of deciding the issue whether the suit was maintainable. I am wholly unable to agree with this view. The previous judgment operated as res judicata between the parties and prevented the Court from trying the merits between the parties. Fraud is no doubt an extrinsic collateral act, which vitiates the most solemn proceedings of Courts of Justice; but, in my view, fraud must first be established as a fraud in relation to the proceedings in Court before the record can be examined for the purpose of giving one Court the opportunity to differ from another Court on a question of fact.

In this case the only fraud complained of is that the appellant procured a decree by putting forward perjured evidence in his favour. If the view of the learned Judge be correct, then there is nothing to prevent the appellant from instituting another suit to set aside the present decree on the ground that it has been procured by perjured evidence. As Lord Justice James enquired very pertinently in Flower v. Lloyd (1), "Where is litigation to end if a judgment obtained in an action fought out adversely between two litigants sui juris and at arm's length could be set aside by a fresh action on the ground that perjury had been committed in the first action....." I do not at all agree with the view that the test is whether the original suit was a false suit [Kedar Nath Das v. Hemanta Kumari Dasi (2)]. The test, in my view, is whether there was a fraud practised in relation to the proceedings in Court by which the defendant in the original action was prevented from placing his case before the Court. Until this is found the Court, in my judgment, has not arrived at the stage when it can investigate the question whether the original suit was a false suit or not.

It has been said that Flower v. Lloyd (1) has been expressly dissented from in England, and that Abouloff v. Oppenheimer (3) and Vadala v. Lawes (4) are the last words on the subject. The last two cases are cases where the judgments impeached were foreign judgments, and it is well established that foreign judgments stand on a footing of their own. At one time great doubts existed whether a judgment recovered in a foreign Court was conclusive between the parties or whether the matter could be opened and agitated in England. The principle on which English Courts give effect to foreign judgments has been debated in many cases. That principle was stated to be, not, as is sometimes loosely said, international comity, but "that the judgment of a Court of competent jurisdiction over the defendant imposes a duty or obligation on the defendant to pay the sum for which judgment is given, which the Courts in this country are bound to enforce; and consequently, that anything which negatives that duty or forms a legal excuse for not performing it, is a defence to the action" on the foreign judgment: Schisby v. Westenbolz (5). A foreign judgment is, therefore, "no more than evidence of a debt;" see Hawksford

v. Giffard (6) and it is obvious that a very large choice is left to the defendant to challenge such a judgment. In India, under the Civil Procedure Code, a foreign judgment can be impeached, not only on the ground of fraud, but on various other grounds, one of which is that the proceedings in which the judgment was obtained are opposed to natural justice. In my view, it is unsafe to refer to foreign judgments, which stand on a footing of their own, in a case such as this where the judgment operates as res judicata between the parties. I am not prepared to admit that Flower v. Lloyd (1) has been definitely overruled in England Baker v. Wadsworth (7) suggests that its authority still exists. So far as our Courts in India are concerned, we have, with one or two exceptions, been always guided by the remarks of Lord Justice James in that case, and I intend to follow them in this case.

There being no allegation that there was a fraud on the part of the appellant in relation to the proceedings in Court or that the respondent was prevented by the fraud of the appellant from placing his case before the Court, the plaint, in my view, did not disclose a cause of action. That being my opinion, I must allow this appeal and dismiss the suit with costs throughout.

BOMBAY HIGH COURT.
SECOND CIVIL APPEAL NO 468 OF 1919.
March 9, 1920.
Present:—Mr. Justice Shah and Mr. Justice Hayward.
K. R. CHITGUPPI & Co.—PLAINTIFFS —APPELLANTS
VINAYAK KASHINATH KHADILKAR—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 133—Contract of sub-agency—Surety—Variation in contract—Surety, whether absolved from liability.

Under a contract entered into between the plaintiff firm and defendant No 1 the latter was appointed their sub-agent for the sale of certain goods on commission on the price of the goods sold. He was in addition to get all his office expenses. Defendant No. 2 undertook to indemnify the firm against all losses, damages and expenses whatsoever they might suffer by reason or in consequence of any default on the part of the sub agent; he "expressly waived all or any of the rights as surety which may at any time be inconsistent herewith and which he might be otherwise entitled to claim and enforce" and agreed that "the guarantee shall not be revocable by him at any time, but shall continue during the employment of the sub-agent." Subsequently, without the knowledge or consent of defendant No. 2 the terms of the sub-agency were varied, the variation being that the sub-agent would receive commission at a higher rate inclusive of all office expenses. The question was whether the variation had the effect of discharging the surety from all subsequent liability:

Held, that the variation amounted to a variation of the terms of the original contract, and, as it was made without the knowledge or consent of defendant No. 2, under section 133 of the Contract Act the variation involved the result of absolving him from liability as surety in respect of transactions subsequent to the variation. [p. 185, col. 2; p. 186, cols. 1 & 2.]

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Dharwar, in Appeal No. 105 of 1918, confirming the decree passed by the Subordinate Judge at Hubli, in Civil Suit No. 435 of 1916.

Mr. R. A. Jahagirdar, for the Appellants.
Mr. D. R. Patwardhan, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—The plaintiffs in this case sued defendant No. 1, the principal debtor, on the contract of sub agency, for the price of goods supplied to him and for accounts, and defendant No. 2 upon his contract of indemnity and guarantee.

The defence of defendant No. 2 with which we are concerned in this appeal was that in consequence of a subsequent variation in the contract between the plaintiffs and defendant No. 1 he was absolved from all liability in respect of the contract subsequent to the variation.

The lower Courts have disallowed the plaintiffs' claim as against defendant No. 2 and in the present appeal, which is against defendant No. 2, the question is whether the lower Appellate Court is right in its conclusion as to the liability of defendant No. 2. The contract in question between the plaintiffs and defendant No. 1 was entered into on the 1st of October 1909. Broadly speaking, the contract was for the sale of certain goods by the sub agent in the District of Poona on commission at the rate of 7½ per cent. on the price of the goods sold, and in addition the sub agent was to get all the office expenses. On the same day defendant No. 2 wrote a letter to the plaintiffs in which the terms of the contract of indemnity and guarantee were set forth. He undertook to indemnify the firm against all losses, damages and expenses whatsoever the plaintiffs might suffer by reason or in consequence of any default on the part of the sub agent. It was also agreed that the plaintiffs were at liberty, at any time or times at their absolute discretion and without giving him any notice, to refuse further credit or supply of goods to the sub-agent and to grant to the sub-agent any time or other indulgence and to compound with him or to show him any forbearance in respect of any failure or neglect on his part to perform his services and duties to their firm or to account for the moneys, goods and property of their firm, and to treat the defendant No. 2, in all respects as though he and the sub-agent were jointly liable with him as a debtor to the plaintiffs. It was further agreed that no change whatever in the constitution of the plaintiffs' firm or in the constitution of the firm of the sub-agent should affect, impair, curtail, diminish or discharge his liability. Defendant No. 2 "expressly waived all or any of the rights as surety (legal, equitable, statutory or otherwise) which may at any time be inconsistent herewith and which he might be otherwise entitled to claim and enforce." Lastly he agreed that "the guarantee shall not be revocable by him at any time, but shall continue during the employment of the sub-agent." Subsequently the terms of the sub-agency were varied in June 1910 without the knowledge or consent of the defendant No. 2. The variation was that the sub agent was to receive commission at the rate of 22 per cent. inclusive of all office expenses.

The question is whether the variation has the effect of discharging the surety from all subsequent liability. It depends upon the construction of the letter. It seems to me that there is no express provision in the letter that the surety will not be entitled to claim the benefit of the legal consequences of any variation in the terms of the contract of sub-agency. It is argued that defendant No. 2 consented to the variation in anticipation without knowing the nature of the variation. It seems to me that it would not be such consent to the variation as is contemplated by section 133. It has been urged on behalf of the plaintiffs that as section 133 enables the surety to consent to the variation, there is nothing wrong or objectionable in the surety giving such consent in anticipation. In the present case it is an admitted fact that there was a variation of one of the principal terms in the contract on the 1st of June 1910. The variation was that instead of 7½ per cent. commission on the price of the goods sold and the office expenses the sub agent was to get a commission of 22 per cent. inclusive of all office expenses. It is urged that this really is not a variation. But I feel quite clear that it is a variation in the terms of the original contract and certainly not an insignificant variation by any means. As to whether this variation would be beneficial to the surety or not is a question with which we are not concerned. Under section 133 of the Indian Contract Act the variation involves the result that the surety is discharged as to transactions subsequent to the variation. I do not think that the general clause in the letter of indemnity under which he waived all rights under the Statutes can be read as implying any consent to the variation within the meaning of section 133 or as entitling the plaintiffs to enforce the liability against the surety even though, according to law, he is discharged from such liability. The discharge from liability is an incident of the variation, and I do not see how any such general agreement could be interpreted as amounting to that specific consent to the variation contemplated by section 133. Such a consent necessarily implies that the surety has knowledge of the nature of the variation. It is not suggested in the present case that the defendant No. 2 had any such knowledge or that he consented to the variation. I do not say that a surety can never anticipate the nature of a future variation and give his consent in anticipation of such variation. But it seems to me that in the present case there is neither a general nor a specific consent to the variation in the terms of the sub-agency, I am therefore, of opinion that the lower Appellate Court was right in holding that in virtue of the provisions of section 133 the defendant No. 2 was absolved from liability.

It is urged, however, that the defendant No. 2 would still be liable in respect of the transactions prior to the date of the variation. No point as to the short period between the 1st October and the 1st of June, when the variation was effected, was made in the lower Appellate Court. The substantial period with which we are concerned in this suit is the period subsequent to the variation; and in respect of the liability of the defendant No. 1 for the goods supplied in that period the defendant No. 2 is not responsible as a surety. It is not necessary to remand the case now for a finding as to whether there is any liability of defendant No. 2 in respect of the goods supplied from the 1st of October 1909 to the 1st of June 1910, having regard to the state of the accounts between the plaintiffs and the defendant No. 1. If there was any substance in this contention, I feel sure that it would have been raised in the lower Appellate Court at the proper time. But the omission to raise that point indicates in my opinion that there is no substance in it; and no attempt is made to show that any appreciable part of the liability of defendant No. 1 determined by the trial Court relates to transactions prior to the variation. It is not necessary now to prolong this litigation by remand on such a point, as was not made in the lower Appellate Court, and as is not shown to be substantial.

I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal and confirm the decree of the lower Appellate Court with costs.

HAYWARD, J.—I concur. A contract of continuing guarantee was, in my opinion, clearly constituted by the letter between the parties. A commission of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and a payment of office expenses was one of the conditions of the contract with the principal, and a commission of 22 per cent. without payment of office expenses was the condition subsequently introduced. The Courts do not consider how far modification is material, but leave it for the surety to judge the importance of any variation. If his consent is not obtained to such modification as this, which is obviously a variation, he is discharged from his suretyship by section 133 of the Indian Contract Act. But it has been argued that there is a saving provision to the effect that "nothing herein contained shall affect...any incident of any contract not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act" in section 1 of the Contract Act and that it has been provided in the letter that any rights of a surety inconsistent therewith should be waived and that full liberty has been given by the letter to introduce variations notwithstanding section 133 of the Indian Contract Act. It seems to me impossible to hold that these provisions of the letter were not in express terms inconsistent with the provisions of the Contract Act. Wherever it has been intended that independent provisions should be permitted, it has always been expressly provided for such provisions by the introduction of the phrase 'in the absence of any contract to the contrary,' which occur in section 146 and a number of other sections of the Contract Act.

I concur, therefore, that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

UDHAB CHANDRA SINGH v. NARAIN MANJHI.

It is a well-recognised principle that governs the relationship between landlords and tenants that the delivery of possession by the lessor is a condition necessary for the maintenance of an action for rent. That principle applies to all kinds of leases, agricultural and non-agricultural. [p. 188, col. 2.]

A landlord is not entitled, in a suit to which all the co-sharer tenants of a joint holding are not parties, to apportion the rent among the several joint tenants. [p. 189, col. 1.]

Appeals from a decision of the Judicial Commissioner, Manbhum, dated the 22nd May 1918.

Messrs. S. M. Mullick and Baikuntha Nath Mitra, for the Appellant.

Mr. S. N. Palit, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

JWALA PRASAD, J.—These two appeals arise out of a decision of the Judicial Commissioner of Manbhum, dated the 22nd May 1918, disagreeing with that of the Deputy Collector, dated the 27th September 1917, and dismissing two suits of the plaintiff (Nos. 951 and 949) for rent in respect of two villages Dimu and Rigid respectively. The suits were tried together and were disposed of by one judgment of the Deputy Collector and also by one judgment of the Judicial Commissioner. They have been heard together by us and it will be sufficient to give one judgment with regard to both of them. The facts are similar.

The plaintiff is the landlord of the villages. He instituted two suits against the defendants and their co-sharers for ejectment from the villages on the ground that they were only ijaradars in the said villages. These suits were numbered 29 and 30 of 1913. They were contested by all the defendants and ultimately terminated in a compromise decree. The present defendants were only parties to that compromise and the co-sharers who are not before us did not join in that compromise and the plaintiff withdrew his claim against them.

By the terms of the compromise embodied in the decree of the Court, the present defendants were declared to be permanent ijaradars of the entire villages and entitled to hold possession thereof on payment of enhanced rents.

The co-sharers of the present defendants thereafter instituted suits Nos. 101 and 111 of 1914 in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Purulia for a declaration of their permanent mukarrari right in both the villages, alleging that they were not bound by the said rafanama entered into between the present plaintiff and the present defendants in Suits Nos. 29 and 30 of 1913 and that on the strength of the said rafanama the present defendants interfered with their possession. They also sought a declaration that the rents before the said solenama were permanent and that they were not liable to pay the enhanced jamas agreed to by the present defendants.

These suits were decreed and it was declared that the plaintiffs in those suits and the present defendants were co-sharers in the mukarrari interest in the villages and that the rents were fixed and permanent and that they were not liable to pay the enhanced rentals agreed to by the present defendants.

The plaintiff in the present suits commenced an action for recovery of rent entered into in the compromise against the present defendants. Their co-sharers were not made parties. The defendants pleaded that the compromise was obtained by the plaintiff on account of collusion and fraud and that they were not bound by the same and that they were not liable to pay the enhanced rents entered therein. These suits were dismissed by the trial Court, whose decision was upheld by the Judicial Commissioner of Manbhum.

The plaintiff then came in second appeal to this Court. It was conceded in the course of arguments on behalf of the plaintiff that the decisions of the Courts below dismissing the suit could not be disturbed, that the only course open to him was to apply for withdrawing the suit with liberty to bring a fresh action.

One of the suggestions made for this prayer before the learned Judges, who heard the said appeal, was that the defendants having been in possession of part of the property comprised within the mukarrari grant, the plaintiff should have been given a decree for rent at least in respect of the lands in possession of the present defendants. Mr. Justice Atkinson, who decided that appeal, observed that there were various matters placed before him for consideration which were neither raised nor discussed in the Courts below and, therefore, in the interest of justice it was necessary to allow the plaintiff to withdraw the case and to institute a fresh action, for raising proper issues and placing all the matters before the Court for proper adjudication in the case. These two suits out of which these appeals have arisen were, therefore, instituted afresh.

Comparing, however, the plaints in these two suits with those of the previous ones, there appears to be no additional fact or circumstance stated in the present plaints, nor has any additional fact been brought out in the evidence on the record. The evidence on the record consists entirely of the decisions of the previous litigation between the parties and the co-sharers already adverted to and of one witness on behalf of the plaintiff and another on behalf of the defendants in each of the two cases. We have gone through the judgments of the Deputy Collector and the Judicial Commissioner in the previous cases. We do not find any fact now placed before us in this case which was not considered in those previous cases.

The only contention raised before us is that the defendants are bound by the terms of the compromise, inasmuch as the Courts below have rejected their contention that it was obtained by fraud or compulsion. No doubt, the defendants are bound by the terms of the said compromise decrees. These terms, as already stated, were that they would be in possession of the property as mukarraridars thereof and would pay a rental of Rs. 125. It was, however, finally decided in the previous litigation inter partes between the plaintiff, the defendants and their co-sharers that the defendants were never in possession of the entire properties as mukarraridars thereof and that their co-sharers were all along in possession of their interest in the same. The plaintiff's suit in which the compromise decrees were obtained was for ejectment, treating the defendants as trespassers on the land. The defendants, thinking that the plaintiff was entitled to confer a mukarrari right to the entire properties, entered into an agreement covenanting to pay the enhanced rents mentioned in the rafanama but if the plaintiff's right to confer the entire mukarrari interest upon the present defendants was illusory, the whole contract of lease embodied in the said compromise decree was the result of the mistaken notion of the rights of the plaintiff. The plaintiff in fact was not and could never have been able to give possession to the defendants which as a lessor he was bound to do. It is a well recognised principle that governs the relationship between landlords and tenants that the delivery of possession by the lessor is a condition necessary for the maintenance of an action for rent. It is not necessary that there should have been an actual eviction or an interference on the part of the landlord, as has been contended for by Mr. Mullick. In the present case the defendants never got into possession of the entire 16 annas of the properties as mortgagors. Therefore, no question of eviction can arise. In the case brought by the co sharers of the defendants, it was held that the present defendants attempted to obtain possession of the entire village on the strength of the compromise but they did not succeed and their attempt was held to be unjustifiable. The rights of the co-sharers were declared in the mukarrari which they had previously held. The plaintiff lessor has not shown that he was able to give possession of the property but that the lessee defendants did not avail of that and wilfully neglected to take possession. In the present case it has already been shown that the property was already in possession of 3rd parties, the co-sharers of the defendants, and it was impossible for the plaintiff to give possession to the present defendants, and until he was able to give possession of the properties he is not entitled to rent for the same, in lieu of the use and occupation of the land by the lessee. The principle was laid down in the case of Hurish Chunder Koondoo v. Mohinee Mohun Mitter (1), which has since been affirmed in later decisions and is the law up to the present day, vide Bullan v. Lalit Jha (2), Narainsawmy Naidu Garu v. Yerramali Ram Krishnaya (3). The principle has been recognised by the positive enactment in section 108 of the Transfer of Property Act. That principle applies to all kinds of leases, agricultural and non agricultural. The plaintiff is, therefore, not entitled to rent for the entire properties as covenanted for in the compromise decrees. The decision in the case of Burhunuddi Howladar v. Mohun Chunder Guha (4) relied

(1) 9 W. R. 582.
(2) 3 B. L. R. (App.) 119.
(3) 5 Ind. Cas. 479; 7 M. L. T. 119; (1910) M. W. N. 221 and 280; 33 M. 499.
(4) 8 C. L. R. 511.

on by Mr. Mullick does not apply to the facts of the present case There one of the holders of an under-tenure had purported to agree for himself and on behalf of the co-sharers to pay the enhanced rent fixed and this arrangement was acquiesced in by all the co sharers. In the present case far from acquiescence in the arrangement made by the present defendants, the co-sharers expressly contended and succeeded in obtaining a declaration that they were not bound by the said arrangement. The contention of Mr. Mullick must, therefore, fail and the claim of the plaintiff for rent of the mukarrari tenure of the villages must be dismissed, and the Courts below were right in dismissing it.

It has then been contended that the plaintiff is entitled to proportionate rent, at least at the rate embodied in the compromise decree with respect to the share held by the present defendants as mukarraridars in the village, and reliance is placed upon the case of Ram Taran Chatterjee v. Asmatullah Sheikh (5). In that case, one of several joint tenants executed a kabuliyat in favour of the landlord for the entire tenure, and in a suit brought by the other tenants it was proved that the other tenants had not acquiesced in the arrangement stated in the kabuliyat, and accordingly it was held that they were not bound by the terms thereof. Subsequently upon an action brought by the tenant, who had executed the kabuliyat, for a declaration that he was bound only to pay rent proportionate to his share in the land, and not to pay the entire rental for the entire quantity of land, it was held that he was liable only to 4. annas share in the interest which he held in the holding. The facts of that case appear to agree in many respects with the facts of the present case and the principle governing that case will probably apply to the present case. But the plaintiff is not entitled to apportion the rent among the several joint tenants thereof, inasmuch as he has not brought all the co-sharer tenants on the record and in their absence apportionment of the rent cannot take place. In the second place, neither in this nor in the previous litigation anywhere has the share of the present defendants been stated. There has been no prayer also in the plaint claiming proportionate share of the rent from the defendants.

Mr. Mullick then prays that the case may be sent back for further investigation into these matters and for their determination. That would be changing the character of the whole suit, and we are afraid it is not permissible under the law. We cannot, therefore, accede to the request of Mr. Mullick.

The result is that the appeal is dismissed with costs throughout.

APPEALS FROM APPELLATE DECREES NOS. 1445 AND 1741 OF 1918.

Appeal, second—Plaintiff not given opportunity of meeting case—Failure to apply for remand in first Appellate Court—Plaintiff, whether entitled to ask for remand in second appeal—Landlord and tenant—Tenancy, nature of, determination of—Residential tenancy—Improvements made by tenant—Rent not varied for long time—Inference.

Where in the Court of first appeal a plaintiff knows exactly the case he has to meet, and considers that sufficient opportunity has not been given to him to meet that case, he should in that Court apply for a definite issue to be framed and for a remand to the trial Court for the purpose of determining that issue, and if he omits to do so he is not entitled in second appeal to have this done. [p. 191, col. 1.]

Where the origin of a tenancy is unknown and it is found that the original tenant and his successor have been in occupation for over sixty years during which time the rent has not been varied and the tenancy has been treated by the landlords as heritable, and it is a tenancy for residential purposes and substantial improvements to the homestead have been effected by the tenants by the formation of a valuable orchard of fruit trees, it is open to the Court to draw an inference that the tenancy is a permanent one. [p. 191, cols. 1 & 2]

Appeals against the decrees of the District Judge, Dacca, dated the 10th of April 1918, reversing that of the Registrar Munsif, Munshigunge, dated the 30th March 1917.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Dwarkanath Chakrabutty (with him Babu Kali Kinkar Chakrabutty), for the Appellants.—The lower Appellate Court ought not to have raised an issue as to whether the tenancy was permanent or not, because that was nobody's case. If the lower Appellate Court thought that an additional issue was necessary, the proper procedure would have been to frame that issue and refer the same for trial by the Court of first instance. There is no justification whatever for the procedure by which the lower Appellate Court changed the issue of transferability into a question as to whether the tenancy was permanent or not. Refers to Irosunno Coomaree Debea v. Sheikh Rutton Bepary (1).

Mr. B. Chakerbutty (with him Babu Satindranath Mukherjee), for the Respondents.—I rely upon the findings of fact by both the Courts below. On those findings of fact it cannot be said that the Courts below committed any error of law in arriving at the conclusion that the tenancy was a permanent one. The case in Mohoram Sheikh Chaprasi v. Telamuddin Khan (2), relied upon by the lower Appellate Court, has been recently followed in Shoroshi Charan Ghose v. Bhagloo Sah (3) decided by Mookerjee, A. C. J., and Fletcher, J., on 3rd May 1920.

Babu Dwarkanath Chakrabutty replied.

JUDGMENT.—These appeals arise out of two suits brought by the respective plaintiff each to recover 4-annas share in a certain homestead. It appears that the plaintiffs, the defendant and the plaintiff in a third suit in which no appeal has been preferred to this Court are four brothers and hold the superior interest in the land in suit in four equal shares. The homestead in suit adjoins their partitioned homestead. It belonged originally to one Annoda Charan Sen and his tenancy right therein has been purchased by the defendant Kailash. Plaintiffs then brought these suits in order to recover joint possession with Kailash each in 4 annas share. The suits succeeded in substance in the first Court. By the decrees of the first Court the plaintiffs were each required to pay to the defendant a one fourth share of the value of the homestead. In the Court of first appeal it has been held that the tenancy of Annoda Charan Sen is transferable and that the plaintiffs are, therefore, not entitled to take any share in the homestead purchased by the defendant for himself alone. That the homestead of Annoda Charan Sen is transferable is based on the finding that his tenancy is, in fact, a permanent tenancy. In the appeals before us it has been contended on behalf of the appellants that the learned District Judge has, in fact, decided the appeals on a case not made out in the written statement and a case on which no issue was framed in the Court of first instance. It is quite true that in the written statement it was not distinctly alleged that the tenancy of Annoda Charan Sen was a permanent tenancy, but there was throughout a clear allegation that the tenancy right described in the written statement as projai right was transferable. The issue framed in the first Court took this form: "Had Annoda Sen the former tenant, a non-transferable right in the land in suit?" This issue is perhaps not very happily framed and perhaps it would have been more correct had the issue run "whether Annoda Sen, the former tenant, had a transferable right in the land in suit?" It is quite clear from the judgment of the first Court that the plaintiffs were in no way misled by the manner in which the issue was framed. In the conveyance by which Annoda transferred his homestead to the defendant, the homestead or the land in question is described as one with ordinary korsa paiyati right of occupancy. This description appears to have been framed with a view to the provisions of section 182 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, and the contention of the appellants before us then is that in trying the issue that had been framed the defendant should have been confined to the question whether this occupancy holding was transferable by local custom or usage. But it is clear from the evidence that was given in the suits that the description given in the conveyance was a misdescription. Annoda Charan Sen, the vendor, was not, in fact, a raiyat. He was a Kabiraj and service-holder. The land sold is exclusively homestead, and on the evidence that was given, the Judges in both the Courts below having this conveyance before them have properly come to the conclusion that this holding or homestad is not governed by the provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act but by the law which was in force with respect to homesteads before the enactment of the Transfer of Property Act. On the evidence that was given the Court of first instance found that Annoda's tenancy was created more than sixty years before suit and that it was created for residential purposes. It is also found that it was inherited by Annoda Charan Sen from his father. The judgment further shows that in the Court of first instance the defendant urged the very question upon which the case has been decided in the Court of first appeal. In the Munsif's judgment we find this passage: "The learned Pleader for the defendant urges that the tenancy should be held as transferable considering the fact that it was inherited by Annoda Sen from his father." Thus when the matter went up to the Court of first appeal the plaintiffs knew exactly what case they had to meet, and if they thought that they had not had a sufficient opportunity of meeting that case they should in that Court have applied for the framing of a distinct issue on the question whether the tenancy in question was, in fact, a permanent tenancy and for a remand to the Court of first instance for the purpose of determining that issue. They did not, in fact, make any such application, and as they did not do so in the Court of first appeal, we are of opinion that it is now too late for them to ask this Court to direct the framing of an issue and a remand for the purpose of enabling the parties to adduce further evidence on an issue thus framed. The facts, as found by the Court of first papeal, are that the origin of this tenancy is unknown, that the original tenant and his successor have been in occupation for over sixty years, that during those sixty years the rent did not vary, that the tenancy was treated by the landlords as heritable and that it was a tenancy for residential purposes. The learned District Judge further finds that substantial improvements to the homestead were effected by the tenants by the formation of a valuable orchard of fruit trees. On these findings of fact, he comes to the conclusion that the tenancy is permanent and, therefore, transferable, and in support of this view he refers to the case of Mohoram Sheikh Chaprasi v. Telamuddin Khan (2). On his findings of fact, it was clearly open to him to draw the inference that this tenancy was a permanent tenancy and we cannot say, from the facts found, that he has, as a matter of fact, come to a wrong inference in point of law. For these reasons, these appeals must be dismissed with costs.

CIVIL REVISION NO. 74 OF 1920.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. IX, r. 9 O. XLVII, r. 1—Dismissal of suit for default—Remedy of plaintiff—Restoration, application for—Review, application for, whether entertainable.

Where a suit has been dismissed for default, the only course open to the plaintiff is to make an application for restoration under Order IX, rule 9 of the Civil Procedure Code Such an application must be made within 30 days from the order of dismissal, and this rule of limitation cannot be evaded by making an application for review under rule 1 of Order XLVII. [p. 192, col. 2.]

Revision from a decision of the Munsif, Motihari (Champaran).

Mr. Harnarayan Prasad, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Ganesh Dutt Singh, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application in revision to set aside an order of the Munsif of Motihari allowing the restoration of a suit, which had been dismissed for default under rule 1 of Order XVLII of the Code of Civil Procedure. The petitioner appealed against this order to the District Judge, but the District Judge decided that no appeal lay to him and dismissed the appeal.

The facts are that the opposite party instituted a suit against the petitioner for the recovery of possession of certain land. A Commissioner was appointed to make enquiries and submitted his report on the 10th December 1918. The hearing was fixed for the 14th December. On that date the plaintiffs, the opposite party, asked for time on the ground that one of their Pleaders was ill and they had not had time to study the Commissioner's report. They asked that another Commissioner should be appointed as the report submitted was incorrect. The Munsif rejected the petition for time and called upon the plaintiffs to produce their evidence. The Pleader who appeared for the plaintiffs stated that he had no instructions and then the Munsif dismissed the suit for default No steps were taken under Order IX, rule 9, for the restoration of the suit by the plaintiffs within 30 days, but some time afterwards, within 90 days the opposite party applied for review under Order XLVII, rule 1. The ground given was that their Pleaders were ill and had not had time to study the Commissioner's report. As stated above, the learned Munsif allowed the application for review of judgment and restored the suit under Order XLVII, rule 1 finding that there were sufficient reasons.

It is contended before me that the only course which the opposite party could take was to make an application under Order IX, rule 9, for the restoration of the suit and this must be made within 30 days. No application having been made under that rule within 30 days, the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain an application under Order XLVII, rule 1.

The learned Vakil for the petitioner relies on the case of Deodip Singh v. Gopal Singh (1). In that case this Court has decided that an application under rule 9 of Order IX of the Code of Civil Procedure for restoration of a suit must be made within 30 days from the order of dismissal, and this rule of limitation cannot be evaded by making an application for review under rule 1 of Order XLVII. This being a ruling of this Court, I am bound by it. It was open to the opposite party to make an application under Order IX, rule 9, which is the special provision in the Code for the restoration of suits which have been dismissed for default. Rule 1 of Order XLVII is a more general rule and is intended to apply for review of judgment. It is argued by Mr. Ganesh Dutt Singh that in accepting the application under rule 1 of Order XLVII the Munsif was not acting without jurisdiction or exceeding his jurisdiction and that whether the cause which he found sufficient was really sufficient or not does not touch the question of jurisdiction. Following the ruling above cited, however, I am bound to find that the Munsif had no jurisdiction to entertain the application under rule 1, Order XLVII.

On these grounds the petition must be allowed, and the order of the Munsif restoring the suit as well as that of the District Judge confirming that order must be set aside and the suit must remain dismissed for default.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 110—Suit for possession under sale—Custom restraining transfer set up by defendant—Burden of proof of custom.

RADHA KRISHNA JI v. SUKH NANDAN SINGH,

Where in a suit for possession of a site in a village under a sale-deed executed by a person who had been in possession of the site for a long time the defendant alleges that according to the custom of the village the vendor had no right to transfer the site, the burden of proving the existence of such a custom lies upon the defendant.

Appeal against the decree of the Additional District Judge, Amracti, dated the 6th November 1918, in Civil Appeal No. 87 of 1918.

Messrs. M. Gupta and K. V. Deosker, for the Appellants.

Dr. H. S. Gour and Messrs. M. V. Joshi and K. K. Gandhe, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff sued for possession of a site in Mouza Lakhanwadi. relying on a sale-deed dated 6th May 1902 executed by Govind. The defendants pleaded that their father had given the site to the mother of Govind in order that she might build a house thereon. It has been found, however, that they have failed to prove this. Govinda then has been in possession of the site for admittedly 30 or 35 years and the origin of his possession is not clearly proved.

It seems clear then that section 110 of the Evidence Act applies and that the burden of proving that Govinda was not the owner lay on the defendant. The defendant refers me to the ruling in Narain v. Behari (1). This ruling states that the whole of the abadi site belongs to the landlord, and prima facie every tenant or village servant dwelling thereon and growing crops in the bari attached to his house is a licensee, protected in his occupation by the terms of the wajib-ul arz. The note to section 203 of the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act II of 1917 states that an ordinary custom has prevailed in agricultural villages in these provinces, that agriculturists and agricultural artisans and labourers and the Kotwar are entitled to reasonable house sites free of charge, but have no right to transfer anything but the materials, except to their heirs or a person entitled to a house-site free. Clauses 5 to 7 of section 203 show that even in the Central Provinces it is not always the custom that the consent of the proprietor is ordinarily obtained to transfers made by persons other than agriculturists, agricultural artisans, labourers and the Kotwar. It does not appear possible to deduce from the existing customs in the Central Provinces that an occupant of a house-site in Berar has no right of transfer. It seems clear that a person who occupies a house-site and has powers to transfer his right of occupancy to any one he pleases may be described as a limited owner of that site. I do not think that it can be held that section 110 of the Evidence Act is applicable merely because it is shown that the palampatdar in Berar has certain rights over the whole village abadi. Govinda has been shown to have been in possession of the site for many years and the burden of proving that he has no transferable rights lies on the defendants. The defendants have failed to discharge this burden: they have not shown that in accordance with the custom of the village Govinda could not transfer the site. The first two grounds of appeal, therefore, fail. It is unnecessary to decide the third ground. The appeal fails and is dismissed. Costs on appellant.

Where a landlord who purchases an estate at a revenue sale has knowledge of an encumbrance which he is entitled to avoid, but instead of avoiding it he allows his patwari to collect rent from the mokurraridar, he is bound by the acts of his patwari and must be presumed to have recognised the mokurrari. [p. 195, col. 2.]

RADHA KRISHNA JI v. SUKH NANDAN SINGH.

Appeals against the decision of the District Judge, Durbhanga.

FACTS appear from the following Order of Reference by Mr. Justice Das, dated the 18th May 1920:—

"This was a suit by the plaintiffs for a declaration of their title to, and for recovery of possession of, the properties in dispute. It appears that a certain estate to which the property in suit appertains was sold for non-payment of arrears of Government revenue and was purchased by the father of defendants third party. Thereafter the defendants third party conveyed the entire estate to the plaintiffs. The defendant No. 1 is in possession of the properties in dispute and claims to have a Mukarrari interest therein, and he says that his interest cannot be avoided by the purchaser at the revenue sale; in other words, he comes, according to him, within the first exception of section 37 of Act II of 1859.

The Courts below have concurrently found that he did not come within the first exception of that section and that consequently the purchaser was entitled to avoid the incumbrance. But the lower Appellate Court, taking a different view from the Court of first instance, has come to the conclusion that though it was open to the purchaser to avoid the incumbrance, as a matter of fact he recognized it and that consequently he has made his election once for all to treat the defendant as his tenant. This is the finding of the lower Appellate Court.

It appears that the lower Appellate Court based its decision on certain rent receipts granted by the Patwari of the original purchaser to defendant No. 1. The view of the learned Judge in the Court below is that in giving the receipts the Patwari was prima facie acting within his authority and that accordingly the rent receipts bound the landlord conclusively.

The broad question is—Can a Patwari by granting rent receipts bind the landlord? The question was debated at considerable length in the case of Sudaman Jomadar v. Behari Mohton (1). The learned Judges in that case came to the conclusion that no inflexible rule of law could be laid down as governing all cases, but they did point out that in accordance with section 103 of the Evidence Act the burden of proof was in the first instance upon the landlord to show the precise scope of the authority he had conferred upon his agent, because that is a matter peculiarly within his knowledge. According to the learned Judges in that case it is incumbent upon the landlord to show the precise scope of the authority conferred by him upon his Patwari or Gumasta and if the landlord gives no evidence as to the precise authority conferred by him upon his agent, the Court may in certain circumstances reasonably draw the inference that the act of the agent was within the scope of his authority. In other words, according to the decision of the learned Judges in the case just cited the question ultimately is a question of fact and must be decided on the facts in each case.

In this Court, however, there is clearly a conflict of decisions on this point. In the case of Wyatt v. Sheo Gobind Sahu (2) the late Chief Justice of this Court seemed to have laid down as a matter of law that it is not within the scope of the authority of a rent collector to consent on behalf of his master to the transfer of an occupancy holding. The learned Chief Justice certainly repudiated the suggestion that it lay on the landlord to prove that the Patwari had not the authority to consent to the transfer. This decision is clearly in conflict with the decision of the Calcutta High Court, but, whatever my own view may be in the matter, I would be bound to follow the decision of the late Chief Justice of this Court, if there was no other decision of this Court equally binding on me. In the case of Srikishun Prasad Panjiar v. Musammat Jeohasi Kuer (3) the learned Judges seemed to have taken the view that the case of Wyatt v. Sheo Gobind Sahu (2) was decided on the facts of that particular case. It will be useful to cite the following passage from the judgment of Mullick, J.:—"The learned Vakil for the appellant, however, relies upon the case of Wyatt v. Sheo Gobind Sahu (2), in which there are observations to the effect that if a Patwari gives a receipt recognising a division of a tenancy, the onus of proof is upon the tenant, and not upon the landlord. That case, however, was decided in reference to its own facts, which showed that the Patwari concerned was not a person ordinarily entrusted with the duty of recognising divisions of holdings. In my opinion this case does not conflict with the long line of decisions which have held that in regard to receipts given by Gomasthas the onus of showing that the Gomastha had no authority to recognise a distribution of rent or division of tenancies lies upon the landlord. In the case now before us this point as to the want of authority in the Gomastha Ramasis was never raised and as neither party has given evidence, the Courts below have rightly assumed that the Gomastha had authority to bind his principal." According to the decision of Mullick, J., then the onus is undoubtedly on the landlord to show that the Gomastha had no authority to recognise a division of tenancies. I am unable to agree that the case of Wyatt v. Sheo Gobind Sahu (2) was decided in reference to its own facts; but I am in complete accord with the view of Mullick, J., that the onus is in the first place upon the landlord to show the extent of authority conferred by him upon his agent.

Having regard to the conflict of decisions on this point, a point which in one form or another is always arising in this Court, I am of opinion that the question should be authoritatively settled by a decision of a larger Bench. I have no authority to refer the matter for decision to the Full Bench but I have power to send the case to a Division Bench. I direct that this case be placed before a Division Bench."

JUDGMENT.

COUTTS, J.—These appeals arise out of a suit which was brought for a declaration of title to, and for recovery of possession of, certain land. The land appertains to an estate which was sold for non payment of arrears of Government revenue and was purchased by the father of the defendants third party. Afterwards these defendants conveyed the entire estate to the plaintiffs. The defendant No. 1 is in possession of the land and claimed Mokarrari interest, which he said could not be avoided by the purchaser at the revenue sale. In both the Courts below it was found that he did not come within the first exception of section 37, Act XI of 1859, but the lower Appellate Court found that he had been recognised by the landlord, who was, therefore, not entitled to avoid the encumbrance. The plaintiffs have appealed.

The only question in the appeal is whether or not the Mokarrari has been recognized by the landlord. For recognition the Mokararridar relies on the fact that for many years after the revenue sale receipts were granted to him by the landlord's Patwari. Now it has been held in this Court that grant of receipts by a Patwari does not amount to recognition of a transfer of a holding and it has been urged by the appellants that the same rule should apply to the present case. In my opinion, however, there is a clear distinction between the two cases. In the case of a transfer the landlord would know nothing about the matter and as was pointed out by the learned Chief Justice in the case of Wyatt v. Seo Gobind Sahu (2), landlords would be in a very difficult position if it were held that Patwaris and other underlings should be presumed, till the contrary is shown, to have the power to sign away their masters' rights. In a case like one before us the matter, however, is on an entirely different footing. In this case the landlord purchased at a revenue sale, he knew of the encumbrance and he knew that he was entitled to avoid it; instead of avoiding it, however, he allowed his Patwari to collect rent from the Mokarraridar. He must, therefore, under the circumstance, be bound by the acts of the Patwari. I agree, therefore, with the learned District Judge that in this case the grant of receipts by the landlord's Patwari amounts to recognition. I would accordingly dismiss these appeals with costs.

SULTAN AHMED, J.—I agree.

Majority Act (IX of 1875), s. 3—Guardians and Wards Act (VIII of 1890), s. 52—Guardian appointed under Act—Minor, release of, from guardianship, effect of—Minority, allegation of—Burden of proof.

The fact that a minor is released from the guardianship of a guardian appointed under the Guardians and Wards Act, has not the effect of reducing the extension of his minority and he does not attain majority till he attains the age of 21 years. [p. 196, col. 2.]

The burden of proving that a person at a particular date was a minor, lies upon the person making the allegation. [p. 197, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Jubbalpur, in Civil Appeal No. 21 of 1918, decided on the 21st July 1918, arising out of Civil Suit No. 3 of 1918, decided on the 20th April 1918, in the Court of the Additional District Judge, Narsingpur.

Dr. H. S. Gour, for the Appellants.

Mr. Gupta, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The defendant-respondent obtained possession on 15th October 1917 of an absolute occupancy holding in execution of a foreclosure decree obtained on two mortgages, one executed on 4th August 1904 (Exhibit P 2) and the other on 15th July 1910 (Exhibit P-1). The plaintiffs are the successors in-interest of one Tejbal Singh, who was Malguzar and Lambardar of the village in which the holding is situated at the time of the execution of both mortgages, and they have sued to eject the defendant as a trespasser on the ground that Tejbal Singh never consented to the transfer and that if he did consent to the mortgage of 1904 he was a minor at the time. On both points the findings of both Courts are against them, and they now contest in second appeal only the finding that the burden of proof has been wrongly placed. Some reference was made in the petition of appeal here to the want of the Malguzar's consent to the mortgage of 1910, but the matter was not mentioned in argument and it is hard to see what bearing it could possibly have on the case. In the plaint the plaintiffs stated that the mortgage of 1904 was attested by Tejbal Singh, but that he was a minor at the time. The defendant, in his written statement, said merely that "he was not a minor at that time." In a later oral pleading he said: "Tejbal Singh was 20 or 22 years old at the time at which he gave his consent to the mortgage bond."

It has throughout been admitted that Tejbal Singh remained a minor till his 21st birth day, for the reason that his mother was appointed guardian of his person and properly on 17th April 1899, when he was under 18, by the Deputy Commissioner under the provisions of the Guardians and Wards Act (see Exhibit P-6), the Deputy Commissioner being at that time the Judge of the District Court as defined in section 4 of the Guardians and Wards Act. It is not stated whether Tejbal Singh was ever released from this guardianship or not, and it would seem probable that there never was any formal release. It seems clear, however, that a release from guardianship would not reduce the extension of his minority. This is clearly explained in Gordhandas v. Harivalubhdos (1), which followed Khwahish Ali v. Surju Prasad Singh (2) and Rudra Prokash Misser v. Bhola Nath Mukherjee (3) and distinguished Birmohun Lal v. Rudra Perkash Misser (4). It is also sufficiently obvious from the words of section 3 of the Indian Majority Act of 1875 as amended by section 52 of the Guardians and Wards Act of 1890.

3. All that the Additional District Judge had to say on the matter of Tejbal Singh's age is this:—

"Exhibit P-6, which is a certified copy of the statement of Tejbal's mother, is relied upon to prove the fact that Tejbal was below 21 years on the date of the execution of the mortgage-bond, but, at the time of registration of Exhibit D-2, Tejbal Singh himself gave out his age to be 22 years and the Court holds that it is not proved that Tejbal Singh was a minor on the date of the execution of the mortgage-bond in suit."

Exhibit P-6 in this extract is a mistake for Exhibit P-5, and also Exhibit D 2 is a mistake for Exhibit P 2. This discussion of the matter, as was pointed out in the judgment in appeal, was inadequate and careless. The learned District Judge himself carefully examined the evidence and summed up his conclusions as follows :—

"The position is a peculiar one, for I have no doubt that Tejbal Singh was comporting himself as of full status when he was 19 years of age. The exotic provisions of the law that wards under the Act do not become major until they are 21 is not known outside the Courts and Bar Rooms, and is utterly ignored in practice if the Courts do not choose to give trouble about it. I really believe that Tejbal Singh was somewhere dangerously near the age limit when this document was attested by him.....I think the fairest decision on the evidence is to the effect that Tejbal Singh's age has not been proved. He was a grown man at the time and, admittedly, the Lambardar of the village ; and under these circumstances, his consent must stand good in the absence of positive proof regarding his minority."

It is then perfectly clear that in both Courts the burden of proving that Tejbal Singh was a minor in August 1904 has been placed entirely on the plaintiffs. Both findings come to this, that at that time Tejbal Singh was between 20 and 22 years of age and acting in all matters as of full age, and as the plaintiffs have failed to prove that he was under 21 it must be held that he was not. I cannot accede to the contention of the learned Counsel for the appellants that in respect of an allegation of minority the burden of proof is to be placed otherwise than in respect of any other allegation. In Virupakshappa v. Shidappa (5) it was held that the plaintiff who alleged that he was a minor at the time of certain proceedings in which he acted as of full age must prove that allegation in order to succeed. In Collier v. Mrs. Baron (6) the burden of proving her own alleged minority in October 1891 was placed very heavily indeed on the shoulders of the plaintiff. She produced a certificate showing that she was baptised in December 1873 and that she was then said to have been born in October 1873. It was held by Ismay, J. C., that this certificate was not admissible in evidence to prove the statement made as to the date of the birth and could prove no more than that the plaintiff was baptised in December 1873, and as she had offered no evidence to show that she was less than three years old at that time she had failed to discharge the burden that lay on her.

Trevelyan's Law relating to Minors says in Chapter XXIX : "When the fact of the minority of a person (whether a party to the suit or not) is in issue in a suit, the burden of proving minority at the date in question generally falls upon the person alleging it." This is the general rule stated in the Evidence Act and, as I have said, I can see no reason for regarding an allegation of minority as an exception to it. The argument advanced by the learned Counsel for the appellants was that the defendant who relied on a deed must prove it valid in all respects in which its validity was challenged. The contention is so far not unsound, but the answer to it is that the defendant has given prima facie proof that Tejbal Singh was of full age in 1904, by showing that he was somewhere about 21 and was acting for himself as of full age in this as well as other matters. The burden of establishing his minority then shifted to the shoulders of the plaintiffs, and it is not contended that they have acquitted themselves of the task. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—The main point argued in this appeal is whether section 217 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code applies when a survey settlement is introduced into an alienated village with the consent of the alienee under Bombay Act I of 1865 and when the period of the settlement has expired after the Land Revenue Code of 1879 came into force. It is conceded that if this point is decided against the appellant, the other points decided against him by the lower Court need not be gone into. We have, therefore, heard the Pleaders on this point only and as we have come to the conclusion that section 217 would apply to such a village, it has not been necessary to hear the appellant's Pleader on the other points.

The facts relating to this point are few and undisputed. The survey settlement was extended to the village in question on the application of the inamdar in the year 1870 under Bombay Act I of 1865, which was then in force. The period of this settlement expired in the year 1888. In 1879, the Land Revenue Code came into force. The inamdar holds the village under a sanad granted under the Summary Settlement Act (Bombay Act II of 1863). The plaintiff recovered from 1895 to 1910 higher assessment than that allowed under the survery settlement which expired in 1888. The Commissioner objected to his doing so in 1910, and hence the suit to establish his right to charge higher assessment.

It has been argued on behalf of the appellant that section 217 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code is not applicable as the survey settlement was introduced prior to the Land Revenue Code of 1879, and not under section 216 of the Land Revenue Code or under any other law after the passing of the Land Revenue Code. In effect the contention is that the words "when a survey settlement has been introduced" in the beginning of the section really mean "when a survey settlement shall be introduced" and that section 217 has no application to the survey settlements introduced into alienated villages prior to the enactment of section 217. Taking however, the words of the section in their plain and natural sense, I am satisfied that section 217 applies not only when a settlement is introduced into an alienated village after the Land Revenue Code of 1879 came into force either under section 216 or under any law for the time being in force but also when a survey settlement is introduced prior to it under the provisions of any law for the time being in force, like the settlement in the present case under Act I of 1865. No authority is cited on either side touching this point; and in the absence of any authority to the contrary I think that the section must be held to apply, as the words indicate, to a survey settlement which was introduced prior to 1879 and which expired long after the Land Revenue Code came into force, as it would apply to a survey settlement indroduced under section 216 after the Land Revenue Code came into force. It is clear, therefore, that in 1895 when the inamdar levied higher rates than those allowed under the settlement with the permission of the Collector, he acted in derogation of the lawful rights of the holders of lands in his inam village.

It is not contested, and it seems to me clear, that in virtue of the provisions of section 217, the holders of lands in an alienated village into which a survey settlement has been introduced are liable to pay like the occupants in an unalienated village only the assessments fixed at the first survey settlement even after the expiry of the period of the settlement, so long as a revised survey settlement is not introduced.

The terms of the sanad do not make any difference in the position of the inamdar. If section 217 applies, I do not think that under clause 3 of the sanad the inamdar can levy rates higher than those which are lawfully leviable from the holders of the lands subject to the provisions of section 217. All the lawful rights of the holders of lands are expressly saved by the clause. The plaintiff's contention, therefore, on this point must be disallowed.

In holding that section 217 applies to this alienated village, I have not overlooked the view taken by Mr. Justice Beaman in Pandu v. Ramchandra Ganesh (1) that the section does not apply to an alienated village where the grant is of the soil and not merely of the royal share of the revenue. That view, however, has not been accepted in the case of Dadoo v. Dinkar Vishnu (2), in which it has been held that an alienated village, whether the grant be of the soil or merely of the royal share of the revenue, would be within the scope of section 217. We are bound by this decision, and I agree with the view taken in that decision that the application of section 217 to an alienated village is not dependent upon the grant being merely of the royal share of the revenue.

The result is that the decree of the lower Court is affirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs.

HAYWARD, J.—The appellant is the inamdar of the village of Bondan. The survey settlement was introduced into his village under section 49 of the Survey Settlement Act I of 1865 in the year 1870. The period for which the settlement was guaranteed was eighteen years. This expired in the year 1887-88. There was a clause in his sanad which was issued to him under the Summary Settlement Act in 1879 which guaranteed all the rights and privileges of the minor inamdars, cultivators or sub tenants, after the expiration of the survey settlement. The inamdars nevertheless raised their assessment in the year 1895 and continued to levy the increased assessments up to the year 1909-10. This had been allowed with the approval of the Collector, but was then decided to be illegal and was prohibited by the Commissioner whose order was confirmed in 1911 by the Governor in Council. The appellant has contended that he was free to raise the assessment after the expiration of the period of the survey settlement, and that would, no doubt, be the case if all the rights and privileges of the minor inamdars, cultivators or sub-tenants ceased with the expiration of that period. It has been necessary, therefore, to consider what those rights and privileges were at the expiration of the period of the survey settlement under the law relating to land revenue. It has not been disputed that the result would be the same whether the inamdar was the alienee of the soil or merely alienee of the land revenue as decided in the case of Dadoo v. Dinkar Vishnu (2).

The rights and privileges of holders of land in unalienated villages would seem to be the same to all practical intents and purposes under the Survey Settlement Act I of 1865 as under the later Act, the Bombay Land Revenue Code of 1879. Those rights and privileges have been discussed at length in the case of Secretary of State for India v. Sadashiv Abaji (3), and the sum and substance of the discussion was this that they were entitled to continue in possession of their lands at the assessment already settled pending sanction to a revision settlement being granted by the Governor in Council. If the holders of lands were bound by the same rules in the alienated village of Bondan, then they also would be entitled to hold their lands on the assessment under the old settlement pending sanction being granted to revised rates by the Governor in Council. No such sanction was obtained. On the contrary it was expressly repudiated in 1911 by the Governor in Council. The question whether the holders of lands in this alienated village of Bondan have the rights and privileges of holders in unalienated villages would depend upon the correct interpretation of section 49 of the Survey Settlement Act I of 1865 and the substituted section 217 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code of 1879. It seems to me that they were entitled to rights and privileges similar to those of holders in unalienated villages both under the proviso to section 49 of Bombay Act I of 1865 and under the provision of section 112 read with the wide expressions used in section 217 of Bombay Act V of 1879. The words used in the opening clause were: "When a survey settlement has been introduced...under the provisions of any law for the time being in force into an alienated village." Those words would in their ordinary meaning include a survey settlement introduced previously under a previous law in force as well as a survey settlement introduced subsequently under a subsequent law for the time being in force. The words used in the following clause were: "The holders of lands to which such settlement extends shall have the same rights in respect of the lands in their occupation as holders of lands in unalienated villages have under the provisions of this Act." The plain meaning of those words would be that they would from the time of the introduction of the Act have the same rights and privileges as holders in unalienated villages under the Act. That would include the right to hold their lands upon the assessments previously settled under the previous Act, which would be deemed to be in force by reason of the provisions of section 112 of the new Act pending sanction to revised rates of settlement being granted by the Governor in Council under the new Act. If that view be correct, then the levy of the increased assessments without such sanction was illegal and was rightly forbidden by the Commissioner and his order rightly confirmed by the Governor in Council. It should also be mentioned that were the other view held, it would only have effect up to the year 1914, because in that year a revision survey was formally sanctioned on the application of the inamdar to Government under section 216, which would in any case be governed by the provisions of section 217 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code of 1879.

It seems to me, therefore, that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Railway Company—Duty to re-weigh goods before delivery—Shortage, whether company bound to certify—Refusal to take delivery, whether justified.

A Railway Company is not bound by law either to re-weigh goods or certify shortage at the time of delivery to the consignee. Therefore, the refusal of a Railway Company to re-weigh goods before delivery does not justify a consignee in refusing to take delivery of the goods. [p. 202, col. 2; p. 203, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

ADAMI, J.—In both the suits which give rise to the second appeals covered by this judgment, the plaintiffs, who are merchants carrying on business at Deoghur, sued the Bengal Nagpur Railway and the East Indian Railway Companies for damages in respect of the detention and loss of certain consignments of Kurthi. The facts in both the suits are practically the same, the only difference being that in Suit No. 15 of 1913 the consignment was made from Cuttack while in Suit No. 4 of 1914 it was made from Berhampur in the Ganjam District, and that while in the former suit the whole number of bags arrived at Deoghur, in the latter the number was short by 2.

It seems that with a view to attract more traffic to their Station at Shalimar the Bengal Nagpur Railway Company carries goods to that station at reduced rates, but that it has been agreed between the Railway Companies that having regard to these reduced rates, the re booking of goods between Howrah Station and Shalimar has been forbidden. There is a rule to that effect. The plaintiffs in either suit had discovered that by booking consignments in the first instance to Shalimar at the reduced rates and then having them re-booked via Howrah and the East Indian Railway to Deoghur a great saving in freight could be effected, and once or twice previously they had succeeded in getting the advantage of these rates. The Railway Companies, however, have discovered that this advantage was being taken and demanded a refund of the difference between the direct through rates and the rates at which the plaintiffs had paid.

The facts of Suit No. 15 of 1913 will explain both suits. The plaintiffs in that suit through their agent consigned 256 bags of Kurthi from Cuttack to Shalimar on the 20th March 1913 under an invoice at the reduced rate. They did not take delivery of the consignment at Shalimar on its arrival, but, whilst it was on its way, their agent who had asked the booking clerk at Shalimar to re-book the goods via Howrah and the East Indian Railway to Deoghur was told that this could not be done under the rules. He consulted the Railway Officials and then put in a written application that the two vans containing the goods which were then on their way might be directed to Deoghur via Howrah. This was allowed and it was arranged that a fresh invoice showing freight from Cuttack to Deoghur should be obtained and presented to the consignee.

The vans when they arrived at Shalimar were accordingly sent on via Howrah and the East Indian Railway and in due course arrived one after the other at Deoghur. On their arrival the plaintiffs were called upon to take delivery and the new invoice showing a rate for the through journey from Cuttack through Shalimar and Howrah was presented. Under this invoice no reduced rate was allowed for the portion of the journey between Cuttack and Shalimar, the ordinary full freight being charged throughout the journey. The plaintiffs refused to take delivery at the rates charged, the amount being Rs. 336, maintaining that the portion of the journey between Cuttack and Shalimar should be charged at the reduced rate and that Rs. 186 was the proper amount for freight. Also noticing that some of the bags were in a damaged condition and leaking, they demanded that before delivery the consignment should be re-weighed and that a note should be made in the delivery book of any shortage found. The Railway Officials at Deoghur refused re weighment before delivery and as delivery was not taken the Railway Company in due course put the goods up for sale and from the proceeds of the sale deducted the cost of the freight and demurrage. The demurrage amounted to about Rs. 500. The plaintiffs in the suit claimed Rs. 1,458 as the value of the contents of bags which have been sold.

The Subordinate Judge found that the plaintiffs were bound to pay freight for the journey from Cuttack via Howrah to Deoghur at the full rates, as they had bound themselves by the act of their agent at Shalimar to pay the freight that was payable for the consignment when it was diverted from Shalimar to Deoghur. He found also that the Station Master at Deoghur was justified in refusing to re-weigh the goods before delivery to the plaintiffs and that the responsibility of not taking delivery of the consignment was on the plaintiffs and they must be held liable for any subsequent loss or damage that resulted.

The learned District Judge on appeal upheld the main findings of the Subordinate Judge, but, with regard to the liability of the plaintiff to pay full freight for the whole journey from Cuttack to Deoghur, he held that since under the rules the goods could not be re-booked from Shalimar via Howrah, the Railway Company should have charged freight for the direct route via Kharagpur, Adra and Asansol, which would have been the ordinary direct route taken in booking goods from Cuttack to Deoghur. In his opinion, the plaintiffs should have been allowed the reduced rate to Shalimar, but from thence to Deoghur full freight should have been charged for the route from Shalimar via Kharagpur, Adra and Asansol to Deoghur. On this ground he found that the amount charged for freight should be reduced to the sum which it would have reached if it had been computed in this way. Also he found that seeing that the Railway Company should have claimed freight computed in this way and not full freight for the route via Howrah, the plaintiffs were to some extent justified in refusing to accept the amount charged for freight before taking delivery and also that the Railway Company were to some extent to be blamed for the damage which was occasioned by the detention of the goods owing to the refusal of the plaintiffs to take delivery. He, therefore, allowed the appeal but for a reduced claim.

The plaintiffs now come up to this Court in second appeal. Their main contention is that since the contract made between the plaintiffs and the Railway Company at Cuttack was that the goods should be carried to Shalimar at the reduced rates and that the goods were so carried, the plaintiffs should be charged only at those reduced rates for that part of the journey up to Shalimar, and that for the rest of the journey freight should be charged for the route actually taken by the vans, namely, from Shalimar via Howrah and the East Indian Railway to Deoghur, which would be much less than the freight for an imaginary journey from Shalimar to Kharagpur and thence via Adra to Deoghur.

Mr. Khurshed Husnain contends that there was really no diversion at Shalimar since the vans had arrived, it being their destination, and what the Railway Company really did was to re-book the goods from Shalimar to Deoghur, contrary to their own rules. He urges that the first contract having been carried into effect, the Railway Company cannot now claim that the full and not the reduced rates should be paid for that part of the journey. I do not think that this contention can succeed. What in fact happened was that before the first contract was completed and while the vans were still on their way to Shalimar, the plaintiffs' agent, knowing that the goods could not be re-booked under the rules from Shalimar to Howrah onwards, made an application to the effect that for his previous contract a new agreement should be entered into to take the goods from Cuttack by way of Shalimar and Howrah to Deoghur. This offer was accepted by the Railway Company and under the agreement it was directed that a new invoice should be drawn up showing the journey to be from Cuttack by way of Shalimar and Howrah via East Indian Railway to Deoghur. The plaintiffs consented by implication to pay the ordinary rates of freight chargeable for that journey since Shalimar was no longer to be the destination. This second contract took the place of the first one and the Railway Company were justified in charging the ordinary rates for the through journey, considering the fact that the reduced rates to Shalimar were only allowed when Shalimar was to be treated as the terminus and as to the knowledge of the plaintiffs, there existed a rule that no re-booking might be made from Shalimar to Howrah. There is also a rule to the effect that where reduced rates are allowed up to a certain station and goods are intended to be sent to a station further down the line, advantage cannot be taken of the reduced rates for the portion of the journey for which reduced fares are charged in booking through to the station which is further on, that is to say, differential rates cannot be combined with the ordinary rates so as to claim less freight for the extended journey. The Railway Company, therefore, was justified in refusing to give delivery of the goods until the proper amount of freight was paid by the plaintiff.

The learned District Judge, as pointed out above, has held that the Railway Company should have booked the goods straight through to Deoghur by the ordinary direct route and not via Howrah and, therefore, should only charge freights for the direct route, making allowance for the portion of the journey at reduced rates, and charging for the extra freight occasioned by the necessity to revert from Shalimar to the direct route which should have been taken. The contract, however, and it was made at the request of the plaintiffs, was that the goods should be taken by way of Shalimar and Howrah and the East Indian Railway and in taking the goods by that route, the Railway Company were only carrying out the contract they had made in agreement with the plaintiffs, so the plaintiffs were bound by that contract to pay the freight by that route.

With regard to the question of refusal to take delivery before re weighment it is settled that a Railway Company is not bound by law either to re-weigh goods or to certify shortage at the time of delivery. Janki Das v. Bengal Nagpur Railway Company (1), Jagan Nath Marwari v. East Indian Railway Company (2) and Ramjash Agarwala v. Indian General Navigation and Railway Co. Ltd. (3). The plaintiffs, therefore, cannot claim that the refusal to take delivery was justified on the ground that re-weighment was not granted before delivery. It is clear that if the plaintiffs were dissatisfied either with the amount of freight charged or the condition of the goods when they arrived, they should have taken delivery and paid the charges demanded and would then have been able to take steps to obtain any refund which was proved due to them.

It seems that the bags in case No. 15 of 1913 were not damaged on arrival, some of them were leaking but the leakage was collected and put into bags.

In my opinion any further damage which occurred after the arrival of the bags was due to the plaintiffs' own refusal to take delivery of them.

The same arguments apply altogether to the suit No. 4 of 1914. In that case the consignment arrived 2 bags short, but in the plaint there is no allegation that delivery was not taken on account of that shortage and the Railway were quite willing to make allowance for the loss of these two bags. Mr. Khurshed Husnain, however, argues that the plaintiffs were justified in refusing to take delivery because of this shortage and could demand that not only should compensation be given for the two bags, but that a reduction be made in the freight charges by reason that no freight could be charged for bags which had not arrived. As I said, there is no allegation in the plaint that refusal was made because these two bags were missing. Refusal was made partly because the method of reckoning the freight was alleged to be wrong and partly because the Railway Company would not allow a consignment to be weighed.

In my opinion then the Railway Company were justified in demanding the full rates of freight from the starting point in each case to Deoghur and the plaintiffs were not justified in refusing to take delivery. The Railway Company were entitled to charge demurrage or wharfage for warehousing or keeping the goods until such time as they found that for the sake of their preservation they must be sold. Any damage or shortage that occurred after the plaintiffs' refusal to take delivery was due to the plaintiffs' mistaken refusal to take delivery. I would dismiss both the appeals and allow the cross-appeals in both the suits with costs in both the cases.

The judgments and decrees of the lower Appellate Court will be set aside and the judgment of the Subordinate Judge be restored in each case. The defendants-respondents will get costs both in this and in the lower Appellate Court.

CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.
APPEAL FROM ORDER No. 50 OF 1919.
February 17, 1920.
Present:—Mr. Justice Teunon and Mr. Justice Beachcroft.
KAMALA KANTA ROY AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—APPELLANTS
versus
MONARADDI AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. IX, rr. 3, 4—Application for ascertainment of mesne profits dismissed in default—Amount claimed exceeding pecuniary jurisdiction of Court—Fresh application to Court having jurisdiction, whether barred.

An application for the ascertainment of mesne profits was made to the Court which by its decree had awarded these profits, but the amount claimed was in excess of the pecuniary jurisdiction of the Court. The application, however, was dismissed in default under Order IX, rules 3 and 4 of the Civil Procedure Code. Thereupon a fresh application was made and in this, too, the amount claimed exceeded the Court's pecuniary jurisdiction; the application was accordingly returned for presentation to a Court having jurisdiction. When presented to the latter Court, an objection was taken that the application was not entertainable in view of the order dismissing the first application:

KAMALA KANTA ROY v. MONARADDI.

Held, that the order dismissing the first application was one made by a Court not of competent jurisdiction and that the second application was maintainable. [p 205, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Tipperah, dated the 27th of November 1918, affirming that of the Munsif, 4th Court at Comilla, dated the 4th of June 1918.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Dr. Sarat Chandra Basak (with him Babu Bhagirath Chandra Das), for the Appellant.—The order of the 29th January 1916 should be treated as null and void or at least should be set aside. The Munsif's Court had no competent pecuniary jurisdiction to entertain an application in a suit of that value. The present application is a good application and should be decided on merits. My application may be treated as a suit. Refers to Bhupendra Kumar v. Purna Chandra Bose (1), Baikuntha Nath Kundu v. Mohananda Borat Modak (2).

Babu Dhirendralal Kastgir (with him M. Mohammed Abdul Hai), for the Respondents.—Dispossession took place in 1904-1905. He has prayed for mesne profits in 1907. Under section 50 of the old Civil Procedure Code he was to value mesne profits which had already accrued. The application for determination of mesne profits was made in 1915. The suit was instituted in 1908, when the old Civil Procedure Code was in force. The preliminary decree was made in 1915 when the new Civil Procedure Code came into force. Order XX, rule 12, makes a departure, and clause 2 is quite new. As regards mesne profits, refers to sections 211 and 212 of the old Civil Procedure Code and to Puran Chand v. Roy Radha Kishen (3). Application for ascertainment of mesne profits is an application in suit. Refers to Order XX, rule 12, which approves the view taken in this Court. He only made an approximate estimate. We only objected saying that the estimate was overvalued. A distinction is always made between mesne profits prior to the suit and those subsequent thereto. On the present application the amount of mesne profits due was Rs. 960 within the jurisdiction of the original Munsif. A person is not allowed to capriciously value his suit and choose his forum. Refers to Gulab Khan v. Abdul Wahab Khan (4). As to jurisdiction of the Munsif I rely on Rameswar Mahton v. Dilu Mahton (5) which is followed in Panchoram Tekadar v. Kinu Haldar (6). Application for mesne profits before institution of suit and that after suit stand on different footings The order of the 29th January 1916 is a bar to a fresh application. He may bring a regular suit or an application for restoration of the previous suit. In this case the case was kept pending for one year by the laches of the plaintiff decree-holder. Refers to section 11 of the Suits Valuation Act. They ought to have taken the objection the Court of first instance at the hearing of suit. They ought to have applied for transfer at the earliest possible moment. So I submit section 11 as aforesaid is a bar now.

Dr. S. C. Basak, in reply.—I shall bring myself within the ruling in Bhupendra Kumar v. Purna Chandra Bose (1) and give up claims for three years.

JUDGMENT.

TEUNON, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit for recovery of possession of a certain parcel or parcels of land and for mesne profits. The suit was instituted on the 4th June 1907 and the decree awarding possession and directing enquiry into the amount of mesne profits both before suit and also pending the suit was made on the 15th July 1908. Appeals against this decision followed and the final decision of this Court was not arrived at until the 30th March 1915. Meanwhile on the 2nd January 19.5 an application for the ascertainment of mesne profits was made in the Court of the 5th Munsif of Comilla, the Court in which the original suit had been instituted and decided. Proceedings on this application continued for sometime : but eventually on the 29th January 19.6 the application was dismissed for default in the absence of both parties. That was a dismissal to which the order and rule applicable is Order IX, rules 3 and 4. On the 21st December 1916 or on the 30th March 1917, a second application for ascertainment of mesne profits was again made in the Court of the 5th Munsif of Comilla. It should be noted that when the first application of the 2nd January 1915 was made, the claim was laid at a sum of Rs. 300 odd in respect of the period before suit and a sum of Rs. 1,300 and odd in respect of the period pending suit. When the second application was made, the aggregate claim had swollen to Rs. 1,700 and odd. On this second application the Munsif of the 5th Court made an order dismissing the application in so far as it referred to the period before suit, and in so far as the period pending suit was concerned, the amount claimed being the sum of Rs. 1,400, he made an order which had the effect that this application was represented in the Court of the 4th Munsif, that Munsif having jurisdiction in all suits not exceeding Rs. 2,000 in value. In the Court of the 4th Munsif and again in the appeal to the District Judge it has been held that the order of the Munsif, 5th Court, made on the 29th January 1916 has the effect of making the present application not maintainable. It is against this order that the present appeal is preferred.

On behalf of the appellants it is contended that the order of the 29th January 1916, being one made in a Court of jurisdiction not competent to entertain an application in a suit of that value should, be treated as null and void or at least should be set aside and that the present application should, therefore, be treated as one which should be proceeded with and decided on the merits. On behalf of the respondents on the strength of the authorities in Upendra Chandra Singh v. Lakhi Chand(7) and Purna Chandra Kay v. Jogendra Nath (8) and the Full Bench case reported as Puran Chand v. Roy Radha Kishen (3) it is contended that further proceedings for the purpose of ascertaining mesne profits can be taken only by way of a fresh suit and that the present application for ascertainment of mesne profits is not such a suit. We may next mention that in this Court the appellants have given up their claim for mesne profits in so far as the period antecendent to suit is concerned. When this has been done, the present case is not to be distinguished in any way from the case of Bhupendra Kumar v. Purna Chandra Bose (1). We must hold that the order of the 29th January 1916 in the Court of the 5th Munsif, in so far as at least as it is an order dismissing the application for ascertainment of mesne profits pendenti lite, was one made by a Court not of competent jurisdiction. On that ground we set it aside. That order being set aside, it follows that there is no bar to the entertainment of the present application for ascertainment of mesne profits.

We, therefore, set aside the orders of the Courts below and decree this appeal and direct that the application for the ascertainment of mesne profits be now proceeded with and heard and determined on its merits.

The appellants are entitled to their costs in all Courts. We assess the hearing fee in this Court at three gold mohurs.

BEACHCROFT, J.—I agree.

BOMBAY HIGH COURT.

FIRST CIVIL APPEAL No. 241 OF 1918.

February 21, 1920.

HARGOVIND FULCHAND DOSHI—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

versus

BAI HIRBAI—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Bombay Court of Wards Act (I of 1905), ss 31, 32, applicability of, to suit against Gujarat Talukdar under Court of Wards—Interpretation of Statutes—Legislature, intention of, obscure—Judge, duty of.

Sections 31 and 32 of the Bombay Court of Wards Act are not applicable to a suit against a Gujarat Talukdar whose estate is under management by the Talukdari Settlement Officer who has been constituted a Court of Wards. [p. 210, col. 1.]

Where the Legislature has made its intention obscure, a Judge is bound to infer that there is no departure from the ordinary law intended, unless expediency or some other consideration compels an inference that it is intended. [p. 211, col. 2.]

Appeal from the decision of the First Class Subordinate Judge at Ahmedabad, in Suit No. 205 of 1917.

The appeal was first heard by Shah and Crump, JJ., who on the 5th January 1920 delivered the following judgments:—

HARGOVIND FULCHAND DOSHI v. BAI HIRBAI.

SHAH, J.—The plaintiff in this case sued to recover Rs. 6,800 on a bond dated 15th March 1914 for Rs. 5,000 with interest from the defendant, who is a Talukdar.

The defendant admitted the execution of the bond and contended on the merits that she was an agriculturist and that an account as required by the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act should be taken. She also pleaded that her estate was taken under management by the Talukdari Settlement Officer, that the said officer was constituted a Court of Wards, that he ought to have been joined as a guardian of the defendant as required by section 32 of the Bombay Court of Wards Act, and that as no notice was given to that officer as required by section 31 of the said Act, the suit was bad.

The suit was filed on the 14th March 1917, just within three years from the date of the bond.

The trial Court found on the merits that Rs. 6,800 were due to the plaintiff, but dismissed the suit on the ground that the absence of the notice required by section 31 and the non-joinder of the Talukdari Settlement Officer as a guardian ad litem of the Talukdar, as provided by section 32 of the Bombay Court of Wards Act was fatal to the suit.

The plaintiff has appealed to this Court; and it is contended on his behalf that sections 31 and 32 of the Court of Wards Act cannot apply to the present suit and that his claim should have been decreed by the lower Court. The respondent contends that sections 31 and 32 of the Court of Wards Act apply and that the non-compliance with the provisions of these sections is fatal to the plaintiff's claim. We have so far heard arguments only on this question of law.

The few facts relevant to this point are not in dispute. The defendant is a Talukdar within the meaning of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act. The Talukdari Settlement Officer has been constituted a Court of Wards for the whole area, to which the Gujarat Talukdars' Act is applicable, by a notification dated 21st July 1908, published in the Bombay Government Gazette, Part I, at page 1474 under section 3 (c) of the Court of Wards Act. In 1914 the management of the defendant's estate was undertaken by the Talukdari Settlement Officer under section 28. That officer published a notification under section 29-B of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act inviting the claims against the Talukdar under that section and signed it as Talukdari Settlement Officer and Court of Wards. The claim was duly submitted to that officer within the time prescribed by the section and ultimately the plaintiff filed the present suit against the defendant.

It is claimed for the defendant that in virtue of the provisions of section 29 G of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act the provisions of sections 31 and 32 of the Bombay Court of Wards Act apply to the present suit; on the other hand, it is contended that under that section the provisions of the Bombay Court of Wards Act would apply without prejudice to, and so far as they were not inconsistent with, the provisions of the Act referred to in the section. Thus the question is whether sections 31 and 32 of the Court of Wards Act can be applied without prejudice to and consistently with the provisions of Bombay Act II of 1905 (which may be taken to be the Act indicated by the expression 'this Act' in section 29-G). The effect of the application of these sections is a question of secondary importance in this case. For even if the non-compliance with the provisions of section 32 of the Court of Wards Act may not be fatal to the suit, as pointed out in Amin Saheb v. Sheikh Maseludin (1), it is clear that the absence of a notice required by section 31 of that Court, if the section applies, would be fatal to the suit. I may here dispose of the contention raised on behalf of the appellant that this is not a suit relating to the property of the ward within the meaning of section 31. I do not think the contention is sound. I am of the opinion that a suit on a promissory note or a bond against a ward would be a suit relating to the property of the ward within the meaning of section 31.

The really important question, therefore, is whether the provisions of sections 31 and 32 can apply to a suit by a creditor against a Talukdar whose estate is under the management of the Talukdari Settlement

Officer, so long as the said notification of 1908 under section 3 (c) of the Court of Wards Act is in force. It is a question of practical importance so far as suits against the Gujarat Talukdars are concerned.

Section 29-G of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act provides that on the issue of a notification under section 3 (c) of the Bombay Court of Wards Act constituting the Talukdari Settlement Officer a Court of Wards, the provisions of the Bombay Court of Wards Act, 1905, shall, without prejudice to, and save so far they may be inconsistent with, anything contained in this Act, be deemed to apply to or in respect of any estate, which may thereafter be taken under the management of the Talukdari Settlement Officer under section 26 or section 28, as if it were an estate under his superintendence as such Court of Wards and the Talukdar, whose estate is taken under management is a Government Ward within the meaning of that Act. It is in virtue of these provisions that sections 31 and 32 are said to apply to the estate and the Talukdar in question. The conditions as to the publication of the notification and the management of the Talukdari Settlement Officer referred to in the section are satisfied. The question, therefore, is whether the application of sections 31 and 32 involves any prejudice to the provisions of the Act referred to in section 29-G as 'this Act' and whether the sections are inconsistent in any way with that Act.

In order to determine the question of prejudice or inconsistency, it is necessary to examine briefly the scheme and history of the relevant Acts. In 1862 an Act was passed with a view to deal with the indebtedness of Talukdars in the District of Ahmedabad. It contained a special scheme. I do not consider it necessary to examine it in detail. It is enough to point out that the Civil Courts were practically debarred from entertaining suits to recover debts against a Talukdar, in respect of whose estate a declaration was made by the Government under section 1 of the Act. The Gujarat Talukdars' Act, with which we are concerned, was passed in 1888. The last section of that Act practically limited the application of the Act of 1862. The purpose of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act, as stated in the preamble, was to provide for the revenue administration and the partition of the estates held by a certain class of land-holders in some of the Districts of Gujarat. Its scheme as disclosed in the provisions of the Act was essentially to give effect to the said purpose: and it is sufficient to say that generally speaking, the scheme was quite different from that of the Bombay Court of Wards Act of 1905, to which I shall refer presently. It is relevant to point out that sections 26 to 28, as they stood before the amending Act V of 1905, enabled the Talukdari Settlement Officer to take up the management under certain conditions which in no sense indicated any kind of disability on the part of the Talukdar concerned to sue or to be sued in a Civil Court. The property remained vested in the Talukdar and the Talukdari Settlement Officer was merely the manager of the estate. Up to 1905 that undoubtedly was the rule applicable to the Talukdars, except in those cases where the estates were managed under Bombay Act VI of 1862. They were liable to be sued and competent to sue even when their estates were under the management of the Talukdari Settlement Officer under sections 26 to 28. In 1905 the Bombay Court of Wards Act was passed, and the provisions of sections 4 and 5 of the Act show that it was meant for land-holders who were disqualified to manage their own property and the disqualifications are indicated in section 5. Its scheme, generally speaking, was different from that of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act. It created a statutory disability for such disqualified land-holders to sue or to be sued, subject to the provisions of section 32. About the same time the Gujarat Talukdars' Act was amended by Bombay Act II of 1905; and the amendment with which we are concerned was that the main Act was supplemented by certain provisions on the lines of the corresponding provisions of the Court of Wards Act, enabling the Talukdari Settlement Officer to invite and to adjudicate the claims against the Talukdari estates concerned without any prejudice to the right of the creditors to sue the Talukdars. Section 25 was amended; but the amendment does not affect the present point. Section 29-A to 29-G, with which we are concerned, were incorporated in the main Act,

They are on the lines of the corresponding provisions in the Court of Wards Act. Section 29-G was enacted with a view to provide generally by reference that the provisions of the Bombay Court of Wards Act may apply under certain circumstances so far as they may be applicable without prejudice to and consistently with Act II of 1905. Thus in 1905 the Legislature did not make any provision in terms against the competence of the Talukdars whose estates were taken under management under section 26 or 28 to sue or to be sued in the ordinary way.

For convenience the Legislature provided in section 29-G for the application of the provisions of the Bombay Court of Wards Act, so far they can apply without prejudice to the main Act as amended in 1905, by a general reference to the Bombay Court of Wards Act under certain conditions. This method of legislation has its own inconveniences, for as occasion arises the Courts have to determine whether the particular provisions in the Court of Wards Act could be applied without prejudice to or consistently with the amending Act, and in doing so the Courts have not that assistance in determining the intention of the Legislature, which they would have when the provisions are directly incorporated in the main Act. Under these circumstances it is difficult to determine the intention of the Legislature with reference to the particular provisions. Just as the words in section 29-G making applicable the provisions of the Court of Wards Act are general, it must be remembered that the saving clause also is very wide in its terms. We ought to construe these words in their plain and natural sense and determine whether in applying sections 31 and 32 of the Bombay Court of Wards Act any prejudice to or inconsistency with Act II of 1905 is involved. In my opinion in the absence of any clear indication, the question of prejudice or inconsistency should be considered in the light of the general scheme and history of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act and the provisions contained in sections 29-A to 29 E. Section 29 D specifically provides that, subject to certain provisions which are not material for the present purpose, nothing in the section shall be construed to bar the institution of a suit in a Civil Court for the recovery of a claim against a Talukdar whose estate is taken under the management or his property, which has been duly submitted to the managing officer. This does not confer any right to sue, but it expressly saves the right of suit against a Talukdar whose estate is taken under management without any limitation. This provision is inserted in an Act, which neither creates nor implies any disability in the Talukdar to sue or to be sued in the ordinary way. Under the circumstances it is clear to my mind that while amending the Gujarat Talukdars' Act in 1905, the Legislature did not create or imply any such disability apart from the provisions of section 29-G. Having regard to the general terms of the saving clause in that section, it seems to me that the application of sections 31 and 32 of the Bombay Court of Wards Act does involve a prejudice to the provisions of the amending Act particularly to sub-section (3) of section 29-D. These two sections are appropriate in the Bombay Court of Wards Act. In my opinion they are not essential and at any rate not equally appropriate in the Gujarat Talukdars' Act: and I am not satisfied that the Legislature intended to effect such an important procedural change without expressly providing for it in the main Act, as is involved in the application of sections 31 and 32 to suits against the Gujarat Talukdars whose estates are taken under management under section 26 or section 28. The fact that claims were invited in the present case under section 29 B and not under the corresponding provision of the Court of Wards Act indicates that the procedure under the Gujarat Talukdars' Act was intended to be followed. Apart from this consideration, however, I am of opinion that the application of sections 31 and 32 of the Bombay Court of Wards Act involves a prejudice to the provisions of the Gujarat Talukdars' (Amendment) Act, 1905, even if they are not inconsistent with section 29 D, sub section (3). There are many provisions in the Court of Wards Act which can apply to Talukdars and their estates under section 29-G without any prejudice to the Gujarat Talukdars' Act. But sections 31 and 32 do not seem to me to fall in that category.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the suit was properly brought against the Talukdar and is not bad for want of notice required by section 31 of the Bombay Court of Wards Act.

I would, therefore, hear the appeal on the other issues and pass a decree in favour of the plaintiff for the amount which may be found due on the bond sued upon.

CRUMP, J.—The only question for our decision is whether sections 31 and 32 of the Bombay Court of Wards Act (Bombay Act I of 1905) are applicable to this suit, and if so, whether the suit is barred by those provisions.

The facts, so far as they are necessary for the determination of this question, are as follows. The defendant is a Talukdar and as such within the scope of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act (Bombay Act VI of 1888). In 1908 by a notification of the Local Government under clause (c) of the proviso to section 3 of the Bombay Court of Wards Act the Talukdari Settlement Officer was appointed to be a Court of Wards for the area to which the Gujarat Talukdars' Act extends. In 1914 the Talukdari Settlement Officer took charge of the defendant's estate with the sanction of the Local Government under section 28 of that Act. The present suit was filed on March 24th, 1917.

The question for decision arises thus. It is argued that upon these facts, section 29 G of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act comes into operation, and that the result is that sections 31 and 32 of the Bombay Court of Wards Act apply, and as admittedly the provisions of those sections have not been complied with, the suit is barred. That section 29 G of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act does apply cannot be contested. The facts here are precisely those contemplated in that section. The question is what is its effect. The operative words are as follows: "The provisions of the said Bombay Court of Wards Act...shall, without prejudice to, and save so far as they may be inconsistent with, anything contained in this Act, be deemed to apply to, or in respect of, any estate which may...be taken under the management of the said Talukdari Settlement Officer...as if it were an estate under his superintendence as such Court of Wards, and the Talukdar whose estate is taken under management a Government Ward within the meaning of that Act."

The only words which can be invoked as limiting the applicability of the Bombay Court of Wards Act are the words underlined (italicised) above. And the question is whether those words preclude the appliability of the Court of Wards Act to the present case. The proposition urged before us was that sections 31 and 32 of the Bombay Court of Wards Act were inconsitent with and not without prejudice to section 29-D (3) of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act. The argument was that section 29 D (3) gave an unrestricted right to sue and that that right could not be fettered in any way without inconsistency or prejudice.

The proposition does not (in my opinion) bear examination. It rests on a mistaken view of the true meaning of section 29-D of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act. The right of suit exists absolutely. It is not given by anything enacted in the Gujarat Talukdars' Act. That Act may limit that right but does not confer it. The true meaning and effect of clause 3 of section 29-D is not to confer any right, but to remove the bar which might otherwise be held to be imposed by the preceding clauses of the section. Those clauses would otherwise be capable of the construction that the Legislature having indicated the forum and the remedy, recourse to the Civil Courts is barred. The right of suit is left unfettered so far as this section is concerned save in the case of claims settled by consent. [It may be noted here that the present claim was duly submitted within the meaning of clause (3).] Now sections 31 and 32 of the Court of Wards Act impose two limitations upon the right of suit. The first is that notice shall be given to the Court of Wards (section 31); the second that the Court of Wards shall be named as guardian ad litem of the Government Ward. The Legislature says to the creditor in section 29 D of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act: "Nothing in this section shall bar your right to sue the Talukdar," and in the Court of Wards Act: "You shall not sue the Talukdar without giving notice and without naming the Talukdari Settlement Officer of the Court of Wards as the guardian ad litem of the Talukdar." Had the Legislature in the former enactment said: "Nothing shall bar your right" the case would be different. As the enactments stand I see no inconsistency between these two directions, nor (in my opinion) does the second operate to the prejudice of the first. The result is that sections 31 and 32 of the Bombay Court of Wards Act must be held to be applicable.

The second question is what is the effect of these sections. The point has been discussed by this Court in Amin Saheb v. Sheikh Masleudin (1), and it has there been pointed out that the omission to comply with section 32 does not necessarily entail the dismissal of the suit. Therefore, section 31 alone need be considered. It is imperative in its terms—as imperative as section 80 of the Code of Civil Procedure from which it is derived. It was argued that a suit such as the present is not "a suit relating to the person or property of a Government Ward," and the case last cited is relied upon. But so far as this point is concerned, the ratio decidendi there was that the suit related to the property of an institution of which the Government Ward was a trustee. That is not so here. This suit is a suit to recover money alleged to be due on a bond executed by the Talukdar. That is, in my opinion, a suit relating to the property of the Talukdar. It follows that the suit is bad for want of notice. I would, therefore, confirm the decree of the lower Court and dismiss the appeal with costs.

SHAH AND CRUMP, JJ.—In view of the difference of opinion on the point arising in this appeal, we state the following question of law for determination under the proviso to sub-section 2 of section 98 of the Code of Civil Procedure:—

Whether sections 31 and 32 of the Bombay Court of Wards Act are applicable to the present suit?

Mr. B. G. Rao, for the Appellant.
Mr. N. K. Mehta, for the Respondent.

FINAL JUDGMENT.

HEATON, J.—The judgments of Shah and Crump, JJ., state the facts with such fulness and clearness that I need not repeat them.

The point for decision is whether sections 31 and 32 of the Bombay Court of Wards Act are applicable to this suit. I find that they are not.

By the Gujarat Talukdars' Act and Court of Wards Act the right to sue a Talukdar in the one case and a Government Ward in the other, is left unaffected, except in certain specified cases with which we are not now concerned; though suits against the Court of Wards and officers acting thereunder are, broadly speaking, prohibited by section 45 of the Court of Wards Act. The point I wish to emphasise is: that the suits which are unaffected are suits, not against Government or any officials, but against the Talukdar or the Government Ward in person and by name. This is clear from the provisions of the Act in general and from section 16, clause (3), of the Court of Wards Act and section 29-D (3) of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act in particular. But though this is so, the provisions of the Court of Wards Act show to my mind with unmistakable clearness that though the suit is against the Government Ward by name, it is, except in form and name, a suit against the manager of of the Government Ward's property. This is manifest from section 32 of the Court of Wards Act, which provides that the manager "shall be named as the next friend or guardian for the suit." Thereafter the suit necessarily proceeds in actual practice as if the manager and not the ward was the litigant. In pursuance of this purpose section 31 of the Court of Wards Act requires a notice of two months before the suit is brought, just as in the case of suits against Government servants. In private suits no such notice is under the ordinary law required. Then section 35 contemplates suits by the manager on behalf of the Ward, a further confirmation of the proposition that the purpose of the Act is to treat the manager, not the ward, as the real litigant.

Is the policy of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act similar? If it is, then it is to my mind quite clear that section 29-G of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act must be read as making sections 31 and 32 of the Court of Wards Act applicable to suits against Talukdars in cases such as the present. The reasons for this proposition need no further amplification as it is, I think, accepted by both Shah and Crump, JJ.

But if the policy of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act is different; if that Act contemplates the Talukdar himself as the real litigant; in other words, if it regards a suit like the present as in substance and in reality a suit against the Talukdar personally; then to apply sections 31 and 32 of the Court of Wards Act would be to go clean against the policy of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act.

The judgments which have led to the reference of this appeal to me, show that the matter can be effectively argued both ways. I have, therefore, to find some considerations which to my mind conclusively point to one solution as correct rather than the other.

I find two such considerations, one purely general, the other peculiar to the circumstances of the two Acts under discussion; and fortunately both point the same way.

The general consideration is this: The application of limitations such as are imposed by section 31 and 32 of the Court of Wards Act could be secured for suits against Talukdars by two methods. First, by enacting in the Gujarat Talukdars' Act provisions similar to sections 31 and 32 of the Court of Wards Act. This method has not been adopted. Or second: by incorporating the provisions by reference; as it is said is done by section 29 of the Gujarat Talukdars' Act. As to this I feel bound to say that if it is the method adopted by the Legislature, it is an unwise, a clumsy and a most confusing method. The provisions contained in sections 31 and 32 of the Court of Wards Act are special and peculiar. If it is intended to apply them to any particular class of suits, that intention ought to be expressed with unmistakable clarity. Unless the contrary is made manifest, the ordinary law as to filing suits must apply to suits against private persons. A suit against a Talukdar is a suit against a private person. I do not see how any one can say that it is made manifest that sections 31 and 32 of the Court of Wards Act apply to such a suit. It is quite reasonable to infer, in spite of the difficulties, that the Legislature intended sections 31 and 32 to apply and this Crump, J., has done; and he may be right; for the intention of the Legislature is sometimes an uncertain thing. But no one can, I think, say that the intention of the Legislature in this matter is made manifest with unmistakable clearness. Yet it would have been very easy to make it clear. On general grounds, therefore, I infer that the usual law applies and not sections 31 and 32.

The particular reason which appeals to my mind is this. In the case of Talukdars there is not as in the case of Government Wards, the same need for such provisions as sections 31 and 32 of the Court of Wards Act contain: for the severance of the Talukdar from his estate is less complete, the management is of a more restricted kind. Consequently there is less need to treat a suit against the Talukdar as if it really were a suit against the manager. What I have said is apparent from the following facts: a manager under the Court of Wards has power to sell exchange, mortgage, charge or let the property (section 26, Court of Wards Act). A manager under the Gujarat Talukdars' Act has substantially only the power of letting, leasing and getting in the profits [Gujarat Talukdars' Act, section 29 (1) and section 30 (2) (c)]. The manager under the Gujarat Talukdars Act is to divide the surplus receipts amongst the Talukdars (section 29 (3)); the manager under the Court of Wards Act disposes of the entire profit in a manner similar to that of a guardian (sections 23 to 27 of the Court of Wards Act). Lastly the manager under the Court of Wards Act is appointed for more than a temporary purpose and usually retains his position as manager so long as the economic condition of the estate requires it. A manager under the Gujarat Talukdars' Act on the other hand is often appointed for a much more temporary purpose, as for example, to avoid danger to the public peace (section 26), or pending the partition of a Talukdari estate (section 27). It is true that at the request of the Talukdar a management may come into existence similar to that under the Court of Wards Act (section 28) and the management in this case is of that kind. But under the Gujarat Talukdars' Act this is only one of several descriptions of management, under the Court of Wards Act it is the sole description.

As I have indicated already where the Legislature have made their intentions so obscure, a Judge is, I think, bound to infer that there is no departure from the ordinary law intended, unless expediency or some other consideration compels us to infer that it was intended. I do not think that expediency or anything else compels one to infer that sections 31 and 32 of the Court of Wards Act are applicable to suits against a Talukdar. Even when his estate is under management, a suit filed in the ordinary way can proceed without any serious fear that justice will not be done.

Whether for other reasons altogether the manager in person or in virtue of his office is a proper or a necessary party to such a suit as the present, is a different matter altogether, a matter which has not been discussed and as to which I say nothing.

I, therefore, hold that suit in this case is not barred and that the decision of the lower Court is wrong.

The result is that the case is now referred back to the Bench before which it was argued who will presumably dispose of the appeal, and make a final order.

Order accordingly.

MISCELLANEOUS CIVIL APPEALS NOS. 140, 147 AND 148 OF 1919.

June 11, 1920.

Present :—Mr. Justice Coutts and Mr. Justice Adami.

Rai Bahadur BAIJNATH GOENKA—JUDGMENT-DEBTOR—APPELLANT

THE HON'BLE Maharaja SIR RAVANESHWAR PRASAD SINGH BAHADUR, G. C. I. E. AND OTHERS—DECREE-HOLDERS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, r. 15, O. XLV, r. 15—Privy Council decree—Leave to execute decree obtained by some only of several decree-holders—Application on behalf of all, whether maintainable—High Court, jurisdiction of, to question decree of Privy Council—Decree awarding costs separately against several persons—Separate applications for execution, whether irregular.

Where there are several decree-holders under a decree of the Privy Council, but all of them have not obtained permission under Order XLV, rule 15, of the Civil Procedure Code to execute the decree, those who have obtained permission are entitled, under Order XXI, rule 15, to apply for execution on behalf of all. [p. 213, col. 1.]

A High Court has no jurisdiction to question a decree of the Privy Council, and to hold that it is void and incapable of execution on the ground that one of the appellants had died before it was passed. [p. 213, col. 2.]

Where by a decree different persons are awarded costs separately against certain other persons, an application by each of the persons entitled to costs for execution of the decree against those made liable for the costs is not irregular. [p. 213, col. 1.]

Appeal against the orders passed by the 1st Sub-Judge, Monghyr, dated the 28th May 1919.

Messrs. P. N Sinha, N. C. Sinha and N. C. Ghose, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Kulwant Sahay and Jagannath Prasad, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

COUTTS, J.—These appeals arise out of three execution proceedings. The facts are shortly as follows:

The residuary ijmali share of Mahal Bishazari, which consisted of a large number of Mauzas, was sold for arrears of revenue and was purchased by Rai Baijnath Goenka Bahadur in the name of his servant Meghraj Mal. After the purchase, 15 out of the total number of proprietors brought a suit to set aside the sale, the remaining proprietors being made second party defendants. Out of these second party defendants, nine subsequently became plaintiffs. The suit was decreed, the sale was set aside and a certain amount in costs was awarded to the 15 original plaintiffs and another amount to the nine plaintiffs, who subsequently joined. Rai Baijnath Goenka Bahadur appealed to the High Court against the decree and was successful, the appeal being decreed with costs. Against this decree of the High Court, six plaintiff proprietors appealed to the Privy Council. This appeal was successful, the decree of the High Court was set aside and the decree of the Subordinate Judge was restored; the appeal was decreed with costs. Five of the successful appellants to the Privy Council then made the three applications for execution, out of which the present appeals arise. The applications were resisted by the judgment-debtor on various grounds, which are detailed in the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge, but these objections have all been disallowed and the judgment-debtor has appealed to this Court.

The first point urged before us is that the decree-holders, instead of applying only for execution of the Privy Council decree, have also applied for execution of the High Court and the Subordinate Judge's Court decrees, which they are not entitled to do, as there is only one decree subsisting, namely, the Privy Council decree. An examination of the applications for execution, which have been made, however, shows clearly that this is not so. What has happened is that by the Privy Council decree different persons have become entitled to costs in the Privy Council, in the High Court and in the Court of the Subordinate Judge, and in order to avoid the confusion, which would have arisen from making one application for several sets of costs against several persons in respect of the costs allowed by the Privy Council on account of each of the three decrees, the decree holders, who have applied for execution, have made three separate applications for the execution of the Privy Council decree for costs against the different persons, from whom they are entitled to costs in respect of the three decrees. The three applications are really one application for execution of the Privy Council decree for costs, split up into three for the convenience of all parties. This objection has, in my opinion, been rightly rejected by the learned Subordinate Judge.

The second point urged is that as all the decree holders under the Privy Council decree have not obtained permission under Order XLV, rule 15, to execute the decree, the applications should be dismissed. It appears that all the decree holders under the Privy Council decree have not obtained permission, but only those have made this application who have obtained permission, and they have applied for execution on behalf of all the decree-holders. This they are entitled to do under Order XXI, rule 15, and I can see no reason to interfere on this ground.

The last point urged in support of these appeals is that one of the appellants, Abdul Wahid, died before the passing of the Privy Council decree and consequently the decree is void and cannot be executed. In the first place, I am not prepared to agree that this Court is entitled to hold that a decree of the Privy Council is void. This point was discussed in the case of Deonandan Prasad Singh v. Janki Singh (1) and in that case the learned Judges held on the authority of Flood v. Egan (2) that Courts in this country could not. Apart from this also, the contention cannot succeed. Ordinarily, when an appellant dies during the pendency of an appeal, if the right to sue does not survive to the other appellants and if substitution of the legal representatives of the deceased appellant is not made, the appeal abates, only in so far as that particular appellant is concerned. In the present case, we do not know whether the right to sue did survive to the other appellants, but even if it did not, the only effect of the failure to substitute would be that the decree, in so far as it was in favour of this deceased appellant, would be void. As I have already said, however, in my view this Court cannot question the Privy Council decree.

In the result then I would dismiss these appeals with costs.

ADAMI, J.—I agree.

Guardians and Wards Act (VIII of 1890), ss. 35, 36, 37—Suit by ward against guardian, when permissible—Guardian, representatives of, whether liable to account.

Section 35 of the Guardians and Wards Act is no bar to a suit by a ward, after the powers of the guardian have ceased and a new guardian has been appointed, against the late guardian for an account of the management, and where the late guardian has died, his representatives are liable to account if it can be established that the property of the minor did go into the hands of the guardian and thence into the hands of his representatives. [p. 215, col. 1.]

Appeal from an order passed by the Joint Judge, Poona, in Appeal No. 78 of 1916, reversing the decree passed by, and remanding the suit to, the Additional Subordinate Judge at Poona, in Civil Suit No. 355 of 1913.

Mr. J. R. Gharpure, for the Appellant.

Mr. W. B. Pradhan, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

CRUMP, J.—The question for determination in this case is whether the present suit is barred by reason of anything contained in sections 35 and 36 of the Guardians and Wards Act (Act VIII of 1910).

On October 1st 1900 Keshav, the deceased husband of the plaintiff, was left as the sole surviving male member of his family, and became owner of the family estate. Balaji, father of the defendants, who was Keshav's maternal grandfather, assumed the management, as Keshav was a minor, and on July 7th 1902 he was appointed guardian of the minor's property under the Guardians and Wards Act by the District Court of Poona. He continued to act as guardian up to the death of Keshav in September 1906. After Keshav's death Balaji continued to manage the estate on behalf of the minor plaintiff and on June 26th 1907 he was appointed guardian of the property by the District Court. Balaji died in July 1907.

In this suit the plaintiff prays for an account for the whole period during which Balaji was in charge of the estate, viz., from October 1st 1900 to the date of his death. That as against Balaji she would be entitled to an account is not disputed: the sole question is whether she is bound to proceed under the special Act, or whether she has also a remedy apart from that Act. It is necessary in the first place to distinguish as to the capacity in which Balaji was from time to time managing the property—

I. From October 1st 1900 to July 17th 1902 Balaji was not a guardian appointed by the Court.

II. From July 17th 1902 up to Keshav's death in September 1906, he acted as the guardian of Keshav's property duly appointed by the Court, and it is to be observed that he, on July 21st 1902, gave a bond as provided by section 34 (a) to duly account.

III. From the date of Keshav's death in September 1906 until his appointment as guardian of the minor plaintiff on June 26th 1907 Balaji was again in charge, not as a guardian duly appointed by the Court but in his private capacity.

IV. From June 26th 1907 until his death in July 1907 Balaji was in charge of the estate of the minor plaintiff as her guardian appointed by the Court. He gave no bond to account under section 34 (a).

In view of the finding of the lower Appellate Court it is unnecessary to consider the period after Balaji's death, for it is found that one Godubai, and not the defendants, was in charge of the estate after that event.

It will be observed that the nature of Balaji's connection with this estate varies from time to time, and his liabilities must depend upon the capacity in which he acted in dealing with the property. That the same individual was in charge throughout is an accidental circumstance which must not be permitted to import confusion. During the first and third periods he was not a guardian appointed under the Act. In the first period there was no appointment and as to the third period his powers as guardian ceased on the death of Keshav. So far as these periods are concerned, it cannot be contended that the Guardians and Wards Act is any bar to the suit. As regards the second and fourth periods there is a further distinction. During the second period he was the duly appointed guardian of the estate of Keshav, and had given an administration bond. During the fourth period he was the duly appointed guardian of the estate of the plaintiff and had given no such bond. The plaintiff as regards the fourth period is suing the representatives of her guardian. As regards the second period she is suing the representatives of the guardian of her late husband. Though apart from the special provisions of the Guardians and Wards Act she is entitled to sue for an account, the distinction has to be kept in mind in considering how far the provisions of the Act may bar a suit. In the one case section 35 of the Act may be applicable, in the other section 36.

The effect of section 37 of the Act clearly is that a suit will not lie against the guardian or his representatives to enforce any remedy provided by sections 35 and 36 save as provided in those sections. Section 35 contemplates (i) the assignment of the bond, (ii) a suit on the bond to recover anything due on a breach of the bond. Now the present suit is not based on the bond nor does it seek to enforce the bond, and it is not, therefore, (in my opinion) barred by section 35. Section 36 deals with a suit instituted by a third person. For such a suit the leave of the Court is required, the object being undoubtedly to prevent guardians being improperly harassed by third persons. There is nothing in the section itself to bar a suit by the ward after the powers of the guardian have ceased, and a new guardian has been appointed, as is the case here. So far as I understand the object of the Legislature, there is no reason for imputing to it any intention to bar a suit by a duly appointed guardian. In my opinion these sections must be construed strictly and should not be held to bar the right to sue unless that conclusion is unavoidable. I do not think that such a conclusion necessarily follows in this case. That a new guardian can maintain a suit against a previous guardian has been held by the Calcutta High Court in Kaniz Fatima v. Sajjad Hosain (1), though the arguments urged upon us here were not apparently advanced in that case. For the reasons which I have given those arguments do not appear to me be valid.

In so far as the suit is against the representatives of the late guardian if it be established that property of the minor did go into the hands of the guardian, and thence into the hands of his repesentatives, there seems no sound reason why those representatives should not be liable to account. That is the effect of the lower Appellate Court's order and that is, I think, a correct view. It is in consonance with the opinion expressed by the Calcutta High Court in Maharaj Bahadur Singh v. Basanta Kumar Roy (2), which appears to me, speaking with due deference, a correct exposition of the law.

I would, therefore, confirm the order of the lower Court and dismiss this appeal with costs. The cross-objections will also be dismissed with costs.

(1) 34 C. 211.
(2) 18 Ind. Cas. 876; 17 C. W. N. 695.

SHAH, J.—I agree. I desire to add that we have considered the decision in Manmothonath Bose Mullick v. Basanto Kumar Bose Mullick (3), relied upon by Mr. Gharpure in support of the appeal. It is based upon an earlier decision of the Court under Act XL of 1858 and section 41 of the Guardians and Wards Act of 1890. There is no reference to section 37 of the Guardians and Wards Act in the judgment. With great deference to the learned Judges, I am unable to accept the view taken in that case. Section 30 saves all remedies open to a ward or his representative against his guardian which are not expressly provided in sections 35 and 36. In view of this reservation I do not see how a suit like the present suit can be said to be barred, unless it is shown to be a suit contemplated by either of these sections. I do not think that the present suit is one contemplated by section 35 in any sense. As regards section 36, after a careful consideration of the scope and terms of the section, I have come to the conclusion that the section does not apply to a suit filed by a guardian appointed under the Guardians and Wards Act on behalf of his ward against the legal representatives of a deceased guardian of the ward for accounts. As regards section 41, it is true that the summary remedy contemplated by sub-section (3) is open to such a guardian. But I do not see how the existence of that summary remedy can be a ground for excluding the ordinary remedy by way of suit. The Calcutta High Court has taken the same view in Kaniz Fatima v. Sajjad Hosain (1).

In the present case there is no order under section 48, sub section (4), declaring the previous guardian to be discharged. Apparently the deceased guardian is said to have filed accounts in January 1907 in the District Court. It does not appear clearly as to what happened after the accounts were filed. On the present record nothing is shown to have been done with reference to the accounts said to have been filed by Balaji in January 1907. It is common ground that there is no order of discharge under section 41 (4).

Mr. L. N. Singh for Mr. Rajendra Prasad, and Mr. Shiveswar Dayal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

DAS, J.—The prior mortgagee, who in execution of his mortgage decree purchased the property, is the appellant before us and was the second defendant in the action, which was brought by the subsequent mortgagee to enforce his mortgage bond. In the suit of the prior morgagee the subsequent mortgagee was not a party.

It was first of all argued by Mr. Kulwant Sahay on behalf of the appellant that the suit was barred by limitation. His point is that the money by the express terms of the mortgage bond was re-payable on the 30th of Jeth 1311, corresponding to 29th May 1904. The suit was, according to him, brought on the 17th June 1916 and was accordingly barred by limitation.

A very interesting point arises whether the 30th of Jeth corresponds to 29th May 1904 or the 28th June 1904. In the view that we take of the matter it is quite unnecessary to deal with this point. I am of opinion that the suit is within time on the materials that are on the record. It appears from the endorsement of the Subordinate Judge that the plaint was actually filed on the 27th May 1916. On that day there were deficit Court-fees due from the plaintiff, and the learned Subordinate Judge made an order to the effect that the plaintiff do pay the deficit Court fee stamp and supply Survey Thana and Khewat within a week from that day. If the learned Subordinate Judge intended not to receive the plaint on that day, it is obvious that he could not make an order upon the plaintiff. The fact, that he did make an order on the plaintiff on the 27th May 1916, indicates that the plaint was filed on that day. The deficit Court-fees were subsequently made good. Mr. Kulwat Sahay, however, argues that in the first instance the learned Subordinate Judge gave a week from the 27th of May. There is another order on the 6th of June giving the plaintiff three days' time to pay the deficit Court-fees, and his argument is that the deficit Court-fees should have been made good by the 9th June 1916. He says that the order sheet shows that the final order was passed by the learned Subordinate Judge on the 17th June, and according to Mr. Kulwant Sahay there is no order extending the time from 9th June to 17th June.

In my view, we must assume that there was extension of time from 9th June to 17th June. If he had not extended the time, he would have rejected the plaint as was filed before him. But that course he did not adopt. He might, if he chose, have made two orders that day, first extending the time from the 9th June to 17th June and secondly accepting the deficit Court-fees. He did not record the first order. We must assume that he intended to and did, in fact extend the time from the 9th June to 17th June. The point, however, which is of importance in the case is that on the 27th May 1916 he did make an order upon the plaintiff to pay the deficit Court-fees. That indicates, to my mind, with sufficient clearness that the plaint was filed on the 27th May 1916. If that is so, it is conceded that the suit is well within time. The first point urged on behalf of the appellant must accordingly fail.

The next point which has been urged by Mr. Kulwant Sahay is that there is no provision in the mortgage-bond for payment of interest after the due date and that there is no security on the property mortgaged in respect of the interest that might become due to the mortgagor. I have carefully examined the point in question and I agree with Mr. Kulwant Sahay, first, that there is no provision for payment of interest after the due date and secondly, that the interest is not a charge on the property mortgaged. Mr. Lachmi Narayan Sinha on behalf of the plaintiff-respondent urges that the interest must in law be deemed to be a charge on the property. With this contention I do not agree. The definition of the mortgage money in section 5 of the Transfer of Property Act, in my view, suggests that the mortgage money does not include interest, unless its payment is expressly secured by the mortgage. If that be so, then the plaintiff is really only entitled to a mortgage decree in respect of Rs. 700. We are not concerned with what the position may be between him and the mortgagor. The question is of vital importance so far as the appellant is concerned.

In the Court below the plaintiff offered to be redeemed by Mr. Kulwant Sahay's client. In this Court Mr. Lachmi Narayan Sinha has argued that he is entitled to redeem the defendant No. 2 in respect of the property mortgaged to him. In other words, he claims partial redemption and he cites a decision of this Court reported as Sheo Narain Sahu v. Ram Nirakhan Ojha (1). Now it is conceded that, as a general rule, a person, who has any right to redeem, has a right to redeem the whole mortgaged property and not a part of it, but this is subject to the exception that where the integrity of the mortgage is broken up, partial redemption may be claimed. Mr. Lachmi Narayan Sinha points to an allegation in the written statement that one item of property has been purchased by some person other than the prior mortgagee. But the point has not been investigated in any Court, and having regard to the distinct offer in the Court below that he was willing to be redeemed by the plaintiff, we do not think that we ought to accede to Mr. Lachmi Narayan Singh's conteniton in this Court. In my view, therefore, the appellant is entitled to redeem the respondent and I would modify the decree of the lower Appellate Court in the following manner, namely, that the name of defendant No. 2 will be added as a person entitled to redeem the plaintiff's mortgage within three months from the date of this judgment upon payment of the principal amount of the money due, that is to say Rs. 700 to the respondent.

We make no orders as to costs in this Court.

The order of the costs of the lower Court will stand.

ADAMI, J.—I agree.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—The facts which have given rise to this appeal are these :—

Certain properties including the property in suit formed the subject-matter of a partition among four brothers, defendants Nos. 1 and 2, father of defendant No. 3 and one Venkatraman. At that partition the property in suit was given to their mother during her lieftime for her maintenance. One Sheshgiri obtained a decree against defendant No. 2 and in execution of that decree he attached two lands, plaint serial Nos. 1 and 2. Kaveri, the mother of defendant No. 2, objected to the attachment and made an application for having the attachment raised on the ground that plaint serial No. 2 was in her possession; that she was entitled to retain it during her lifetime and that there was a charge thereon for certain sums to be paid by the brothers for her funeral ceremonies after her death. The allegation as to the other land was that it was subject to a charge of her maintenace at a certain monthly rate. This application was granted on the 16th of August 1901. Thereafter on the Darkhast of Sheshgiri an order was made on the 30th of October 1901 directing the sale of both the properties, including the property plaint serial No. 2, subject to certain charges which were claimed by Kaveri in her application. The right, title and interest of defendant No. 2 in the property were put up for sale subject to the charges mentioned in the order of the 30th of October and the plaintiff purchased the same. The sale was duly confirmed and apparently no objection was taken to the sale thereafter either by the decree holder or the judgment-debtor. Kaveri died in 1915, and the auction purchaser filed the present suit in 1917 for the partition of the property described as plaint serial No. 2 and claimed his one fourth share which represented the interest of defendant No. 2 in the property. Defendants Nos. 1 and 2 contended that in fact there was no attachment of the property in question and that the sale in the absence of any previous attachment was void according to law. The defendant No. 3 did not appear, and defendant No. 4, who was a purchaser of the share of Venkatramar, claimed that on partition his one-fourth share might be assigned to him.

The trial Court found that the plaint property was released from attachment at the date of the sale, but that Court came to the conclusion that the sale was valid in spite of the absence of a formal attachment at the date of the sale. Accordingly a decree was passed in favour of the plaintiff, allowing him his one-fourth share in the plaint serial No. 2 by partition. There was also a decree for past mesne profits and future mesne profits against defendant No. 2. The defendant No. 4 also was allowed under the decree to recover his one-fourth share by partition in the property.

The defendant No. 1 appealed to the District Court from this decree against the plaintiff and defendant No. 4. He did not join defendants Nos. 2 and 3 as respondents to his appeal. The Appellate Court came to the conclusion that the property had been sold by the Court when it was not under attachment and that the sale was void in consequence of the absence of attachment at the time. The learned District Judge accordingly reversed the decision and allowed the appeal with costs.

In support of the appeal, which has been preferred from the decree of the District Court, it has been urged that the property was under attachment in fact when the execution proceedings relating to sale of the right, title and interest of the present defendant No. 2 went on in the executing Court on the Darkhast filed by Sheshgiri, that even if there was no attachment the sale was not void, and that under the circumstances of this case it was not open to the lower Appellate Court to reverse the decree on the appeal of defendant No. 1 as defendant No. 2 had not joined him in the appeal.

We have heard the Pleader for the respondent on the first and the last points, and in the view which we take of those points we have not considered it necessary to hear him fully on the question as to whether the sale effected by the Court in the absence of any prior attachment would be valid or not.

It may be noted that in the appeal preferred to this Court by the plaintiff defendants Nos. 2 and 3 have not been joined as parties.

The first point to be considered is whether the lower Courts are right in their view that there was no attachment of the property which was put up for sale. The facts relating to the point are that the property was in fact attached in the first instance on the application of Sheshgiri, that there was subsequently an order on Kaveri's applica tion and that later on in the Darkhast proceedings there was an order stating the effect of the order on Kaveri's application. If the effect of the order is correctly stated by the executing Court in its order of the 30th of October 1901, it seems to me that the property was duly attached at the time. To start with, in this case there was an attachment of the property on the Darkhast of Sheshgiri. It is urged on behalf of the respondent that that attachment was raised by an order on Kaveri's application under rule 60 of Order XXI. If the order stood by itself, there would be much to be said in favour of the view that the attachment was wholly raised so far as the property in question was concerned. But the order is very brief and it is quite clear that in its entirety it is difficult to apply it with reference to the other property which formed the subject matter of that application and of the attachment. As regards the other property the claim of Kaveri was that it was subject to a certain charge. As regards the property now in question her claim was that she was in possession and that she was entitled to enjoy the property during her lifetime. No doubt in the application she proceeded to say that the defendant No. 2 had no right to the property. But it is clear that her meaning was that during her lifetime he had no right to the property, and that it was subject to a certain charge for her funeral expenses. In October 1901 when in executing the decree in favour of Sheshgiri the Court read this order as meaning that the right, title and interest of defendant No. 2 in the property was liable to be sold subject to the interest of Kaveri, which was stated in the order, it seems to me that the executing Court which had passed the order on Kaveri's application interpreted it in a manner in which it was reasonably capable of being interpreted. If the order had been in that form in terms, it seems to me that it would have been a valid order under rule 60 which enables the Court to make an order releasing the property wholly or to such extent as it thinks fit from attachment. The order having been so interpreted by the executing Court and the prior attachment having been treated as being still in force, the property was put up for sale. In due course the plaintiff purchased the right, title and interest of the present defendant No. 2 in the property. I do not see how it could be said that there was absolutely no attachment of the property in question. It is clear on the allegation of Kaveri in that application that the judgment debtor had some saleable interest at the time; and though the order was in a general form, it was rightly understood by the executing Court to mean that the property was liable to be sold, subject to Kaveri's interest therein. I am clearly of opinion that the property was sufficiently attached and that all the subsequent proceedings including the sale of the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor were in order, and there is no real basis for the objection that the sale is void in consequence of the absence of any attachment.

In this view of the matter it is not necessary to consider the interesting question as to whether in the absence of an attachment a sale effected by the Court would be valid or not. In favour of its validity reliance was placed in the course of the argument upon the decision in Kishory Mohun Roy v. Mahomed Mujoffar Hossein (1) and Malkarjun v. Narhari (2). On the other hand in favour of the view that in the absence of any prior attachment the sale would be void reliance was placed upon the case of Balkrishna v. Masuma Bibi (3). It is not necessary, as I have said, to express any opinion on this question, as in my opinion the property was under attachment subject to Kaveri's interest at the material time.

The only other question which requires consideration is whether on the appeal of defendant No. 1 alone the lower Appellate Court could have passed the decree now under appeal. It becomes necessary to consider that question as defendants Nos. 2 and 3 have not been joined as parties to this appeal. It would have been far more satisfactory if they had been joined as parties to this appeal, quite apart from the consideration as to whether they were parties to the appeal in the lower Appellate Court. In the trial Court the defendant No. 2 joined defendant No. 1 in raising the question as to the validity of the Court sale. But that Court decided the question against them, and defendant No. 2 did not appeal from the decree for partition which was passed on the basis that his right, title and interest had been validly conveyed to the plaintiff. It seems to me under the circumstances that the defendant No. 2 not having appealed, it was not open to defendant No. 1 to object to partition on that ground. Admittedly the defendants were tenants-in-common and there could be no doubt that either defendant No. 2 or the person claiming to be the owner of his right, title and interest would be entitled to his share. Defendant No. 1 never contended that defendant No. 2 had no share in the property. Though it might appear that the point which he raised in the appeal was one which was raised in the trial Court, in view of the fact that defendant No. 2 did not appeal from that decree, it cannot be said that defendant No. 1 could raise a point which it was open to defendant No. 2 primarily to raise and which by his omission to appeal he must be taken to have given up. It seems to me, therefore, that on the appeal of defendant No. 1 the decree of the trial Court could not have been properly reversed. In that view of the matter in spite of the absence of defendants Nos. 2 and 3 on the record of this appeal, I have come to the conclusion that this appeal may be disposed of without further delaying the proceedings by directing defendants Nos. 2 and 3 to be joined as parties to the appeal.

On these grounds I would allow this appeal, set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and restore the decree of the trial Court with costs of this appeal and in the lower Appellate Court on defendant No. 1.

TARAPADA MITTER—DECREE-HOLDER—RESPONDENT.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 182 (5)—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 39—Application for transfer of decree for execution—Certificate not sent through District Judge—Application, whether "in accordance with law."

Where the holder of a decree applies to the Court to have his decree transferred to another Court for execution, and his application is allowed, and a certificate issued, but through the mistake of the Court the certificate is sent direct to the Court in which execution is sought instead of through the District Judge, the application of the decree-holder is nonetheless an application made "in accordance with law" as required by Article 182 (5) of Schedule I to the Limitation Act. [p. 221, col. 1.]

It is not necessary in an application for transfer for the decree-holder to specify that the transfer certificate should go through the District Judge. [p 221, col. 2.]

HANMANT TIMAJI DESAI v. RAGHAVENDRA GURURAO DESAI.

JUDGMENT.

COUTTS, J.—This is an appeal by the judgment debtor against an order of the Subordinate Judge of Deoghar, disallowing an objection in an execution proceeding. It appears that one Tarapada Mitter obtained a decree against Kunj Bihari Singh, Sahadeo Narain Singh and Rani Jagdamba Kumari on the 3rd of April 1915. The decree was drawn up on the 23rd of April 1915. On the 22nd of December 1915 the decree holder applied to the Subordinate Judge of Hazaribagh, in whose Court the decree had been obtained, to have his decree transferred to the Subordinate Judge of Deoghar for execution. The application was allowed and a certificate issued on the 6th of January 1916 by the Subordinate Judge, Hazaribagh. By the mistake of the Subordinate Judge, however, the certificate was sent direct to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Deoghar, who continued the execution proceeding. Subsequently an appeal was made to the High Court* and the execution proceedings in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Deoghar were quashed on the ground that the order, transferring the execution proceeding to Deoghar, was bad as the certificate should not have been addressed direct to the Subordinate Judge of Deoghar but to the District Judge of the Santal Parganas and directions given by him to the Subordinate Judge of Deoghar. The matter was put right and eventually the execution proceeding reached the Subordinate Judge of Deoghar through the proper channel on the 14th of November 1918. The contention of the judgment-debtor was that the application having reached the Subordinate Judge of Deoghar more than three years after the date of the decree, it was barred by limitation under section 182 of the Limitation Act. It is not contended before us that an application for transfer is not a step-in-aid of execution, but what is contended is that the application, which was made to the Subordinate Judge of Hazaribagh for a certificate of transfer, was not made "in accordance with law" as required by Article 182 (5) of the Limitation Act inasmuch as it was not therein stated that the transfer certificate should go through the District Judge of Santal Parganas, I can see no force in this contention. The decree holder wished to have his decree executed in Deoghar and he made an application for a transfer certificate for this purpose. Unfortunately, a mistake was made by the Subordinate Judge of Hazaribagh, but this does not make the application of the decree-holder not in accordance with law. It was not, I think, for the decree-holder to point out to the Subordinate Judge the way he should proceed. The mistake was purely a mistake of the Subordinate Judge and the application for transfer was, in my opinion, made in accordance with law. I would dismiss this appeal with costs.

ADAMI, J.—I agree.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXIV, r. 14—Decree in mortgage suit payable by instalments—Provision for default – Decree-holder, whether entitled to enforce decree.

A decree in a mortgage suit provided for payment of the mortgage-debt by instalments and directed that in the event of two instalments being in default the decree-holder would be entitled to recover the whole sum then due by sale of the mortgaged property. The judgment-debtor paid the first instalment, made default in the second and paid the third. The decree-holder applied to execute the decree by sale of the mortgaged property:

Held, that the decree-holder was bound by the terms of the decree and was not entitled to bring the property to sale, because admittedly there was a default in the payment of one instalment only at the time of the application for execution. [p. 222, col. 2; p. 223, col. 1.]

First appeal from the decision of the Fist Class, Subordinate Judge at Dharwar, in Darkhast No. 318 of 1918.

Mr. N. V. Gokhale, for the Appellant.

Mr. R. A. Jahagirdar, for Respondent No. 1.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—This appeal arises out of an application made by the decree-holder to execute the decree passed on an award. Originally in 1904 a simple mortgage bond was passed by defendant No. 1 in favour of the plaintiff and his brother for Rs. 6,500. The disputes between the parties as to this bond were referred to an arbitrator and an award was made. Subsequently on the application of the plaintiff which was registered as a suit, a decree was passed in terms of the award. Under that decree the defendants were to pay Rs. 14,000 in eleven instalments. The first ten instalments were to be annual instalments of Rs. 1,300 each and the last instalment was to be of Rs. 1,C00. The first instalment was to be paid on the 1st of August 1916 and the other instalments were to be paid on the 1st of August every following year. The decree further provided that in case of default by defendants to pay any two instalments out of the said instalments, the said instalments should be paid within six months from the date of default of the second instalment; and in case of default to pay the said instalments within six months accordingly plaintiff do recover the whole of the amount, viz., the amount of the said two instalments and the subsequent instalments remaining unpaid on that day, together with costs, by sale of the property mentioned in the simple mortgage bond. The defendants paid the first instalment on the 1st of August 1916, and the present darkhast was filed in July 1918 to recover the second instalment payable on the 1st of August 1917 with insterest by sale of a part of the mortgaged property. The part of the mortgaged property was specified in the darkhast, and it was stated in the darkhast that the instalment payable on the 1st of August 1918 had been already paid to the decree-holder. The defendants objected to the sale of a part of the mortgaged property.

The First Class Subordinate Judge, who dealt with this darkhast, allowed execution to proceed on the footing that the defendants were personally liable to pay the sum of Rs. 1,300 and that it was open to the decree-holder to realize that amount by the sale of the property mentioned in the darkhast not as part of the mortgaged property, but as property belonging to the judgment-debtors.

From this order the present appeal is preferred to this Court, and it is urged on behalf of the appellant that the darkhast is premature.

I desire to make it clear at the outset that in this darkhast we are concerned only with the prayer of the decree-holder to realize the amount of the instalment by the sale of a part of the mortgaged property. We are not concerned with the question as to whether, apart from any right to bring to sale a part of the mortgaged property, the decree-holder can recover the amount personally from the defendants or by the sale of any property of the judgment debtors other than the mortgaged property. That question does not arise in this darkhast, and I express no opinion as to the remedy which the decree-holder may have as regards the sum in question against the defendants personally or the other property of the defendants.

It seems to me clear that on the facts stated above and on the terms of the decree, the present darkhast to bring to sale a part of the mortgaged property is premature. The instalment of Rs. 1,300 forms part of the mortgage amount; and the terms of rule 14 of Order XXXIV show that where a mortgagee has obtained a decree for the payment of money in satisfaction of a claim arising under the mortgage, he shall not be entitled to bring the mortgaged property to sale otherwise than by instituting a suit for sale in enforcement of the mortgage. The suit in which the plaintiff has obtained the decree now sought to be executed may be treated as a suit for sale in enforcement of the mortgage within the meaning of this rule. But it is clear that the decree-holder is not entitled to bring the mortgaged property to sale otherwise than by instituting such a suit. Treating the suit out of which these proceedings have arisen as a suit for sale in enforcement of the mortgage, it seems to me that the decree-holder is clearly bound by the terms of the decree. Under the terms of the decree the plaintiff can recover the whole amount which may have remained unpaid after default in the payment of any two instalments by the sale of the property mentioned in the mortgage bond. At the date of this darkhast the contingency had not arisen, because admittedly there was a default in the payment of one instalment only at the time. The whole amount had not become due, and the right to bring the property to sale under the decree had not accrued to the decree-holder. Under these circumstances it seems to me that the present darkhast is premature, treating it strictly as a darkhast for enforcing the decree by the sale of a part of the mortgaged property. In my opinion the lower Court was wrong in allowing the property to be sold otherwise than under the terms of the decree.

I would, therefore, allow this appeal and dismiss the darkhast without prejudice to the right of the decree-holder to claim this amount in any subsequent darkhast which he may be advised to file.

Having regard to all the circumstances we direct that each party should bear his own costs throughout.

HAYWARD, J.—I agree. It is an anomalous decree and it is quite possible that the second instalment of Rs. 1,300 will be recoverable at once personally against the judgment-debtor notwithstanding the provisions of rules 4 and 6 of Order XXXIV of the First Schedule to the Civil Procedure Code. But it seems to me quite clear that the amount is not recoverable now by the sale of any part of the mortgaged property both in view of the precise terms of the decree and of the principles underlying rule 14 of Order XXXIV of the First Schedule of the Civil Procedure Code.

Appeal from a decision of the Subordinate Judge, Hazaribagh.

Messrs. Sushil Madhab Mullick and B. C. Mitter, for Appellant in No. 94 and Respondent in No. 110.

Mr. A. K. Ray, for Respondents in No. 94 and Appellants in No. 110.

JUDGMENT.

COUTTS, J.—These two appeals arise out of an execution proceeding. The decree-holders, Srinath Kundu and others, made an application for execution on the 28th of April 1910, which is still pending. The judgment debtors objected to the execution on the ground that it was barred by limitation, that it could not be maintained by the decree holders who are mere Farzidars of the original decree-holders and that the amount applied for in execution is exorbitant. The objections were allowed in part and both the decree-holders and the judgment-debtors have appealed.

The judgment debtors' appeal is No. 94. The only point which is urged in support of their appeal is that the application is barred by limitation. A preliminary decree was passed on the 8th of July 1898 and an order absolute was passed on the 3rd of July 1901. The decree-holders' case is that the first application for execution was made in the year 1903, the second application was made in the same year, the third application was made on the 30th of March 1905, the fourth application on the 29th of October 1908 and the fifth application, which is the present application, was made on the 28th of April 1910. The application is within 12 years of the decree so it is clearly not barred by 12 years' rule of limitation, but it is contended that the application of the 30th of March 1905 was barred by limitation and that, therefore, the subsequent applications including the present application are also barred by limitation.

Now the application of the 30th of March 1905 is certainly more than three years from the date of the decree absolute, but the decree-holders rely to save limitation on the two applications for execution said to have been made in the year 1903. The records and the execution registers have been destroyed in accordance with the rules, and the only evidence we have of these applications is a note by the Civil Sheristadar of the Deputy Commissioner, Subordinate Judge, on the back of the 3rd execution petition, which shows that two previous execution petitions made in the year 1903 were registered. What the learned Vakil for the appellant contends, however, is that even if we accept this note, and there is no reason why the note should not be accepted, there is nothing to show that these execution petitions were in accordance with law as required by Article 182 of the Limitation Act. I cannot accept this argument. The Sheristadar's note shows that the applications for execution were registered; this is not ordinarily done unless they are in accordance with law and the fact of the application having been registered is, in my opinion, sufficient to establish that the applications are in fact in accordance with law. Moreover it is clear that no objection on the ground of limitation was made either to the 3rd or to the 4th applications for execution and this being so, it is not open to the judgment debtors to raise this plea now. I would accordingly dismiss this appeal with costs.

I now come to the decree-holders' appeal No. 110. With regard to this appeal the learned Subordinate Judge has found that the decree-holders are not entitled to any interest after the period of grace and it is in regard to this matter only that the decree holders have appealed. The preliminary decree, as I have already said, was passed on the 14th of July 1898. The portion of it which refers to interest runs as follows: "That defendant No. 1 is to pay to plaintiffs the costs incurred by them, and that till the day of realisation interest on the bond money will run at the rate mentioned therein" and it is argued by the learned Vakil for the appellants that on a proper construction of this decree the decree holders are entitled to interest on the bond rate until the money is actually realised. The meaning of "day of realisation" in a preliminary mortgage decree has been discussed by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Sunder Koer v. Rai Sham Krishen (1). In that case their Lordships in considering the case of Rameswar Koer v. Mahomed Mehdi Hossein Khan (2) made the following observations: "The expression 'up to the date of realisation' may have been used per incuriam, or it may have meant 'the day fixed for realisation,' as in fact it seems to have been understood by the reporter of the case in the Indian Law Reports as expressed in his marginal note. Their Lordships cannot have intended to say that sections 86 and 88 of the Transfer of Property Act indicate that interest at the mortgage rate should be paid up to the time of actual payment of the mortgage money to the mortgagee. These sections contain no direction for interest beyond the day to be fixed by the Court up to which the account is directed to be taken, and in fact the whole difficulty on which there has been so much controversy has arisen from that circumstance. It is enough to say that the question as to rate of interest (if any) to be allowed after the fixed day until actual realisation was not before the Board, and the case is not an authority on that question." And again at a later stage of their judgment their Lordships said: "That a general account should be taken once for all, and an aggregate amount be stated in the decree for principal, interest and costs due on a fixed day, and that after the expiration of that day, if the property should not be redeemed, the matter should pass from the domain of contract to that of judgment, and the rights of the mortgagee should thenceforth depend, not on the contents of his bond, but on the directions in the decree". It seems clear then that the words "Date of realisation" in the preliminary mortgage decree should be interpreted to mean the date of the expiry of the period of grace and that for the interest after this period the final decree should be looked to. In the present case there is no direction as to interest in the final decree. There is only the order dated the 3rd of July 1901 "The decree is hereby made absolute." There is thus, as I have already said, no direction in the final decree for interest and this being so the learned Subordinate Judge was, in my opinion, right in his conclusion that it must be deemed to have been refused.

We have been referred by the learned Vakil for the appellants to the case of Gokuldas v. Ghasiram (3), in which the interest which had been allowed in the preliminary decree was allowed at the same rate until actual realisation. That case, however, stands on an entirely different footing to the present case. In that case the final order ran as follows: "Whereas it appears to this Court that the defendant in this suit has not paid into Court or to the plaintiff the sum of Rs. 20,457-4 plus Rs. 1,106-0-0 and interest at 7 annas per cent. per mensem from the 22nd July 1896 which by the conditional decree passed by this Court on 18th September 1896 he was required to pay on or before the 18th March 1897, it is hereby ordered that the conditional decree be made absolute." There was in that case no date fixed in the preliminary decree upto which interest at the rate allowed was to be payable. Consequently it was held that interest at that rate was to continue after the period of grace up till the date of actual payment. In the present case, however, the period fixed in the preliminary decree is the date of realisation which is the end of the period of grace. The case referred to, therefore, has no bearing on the present case. On the other hand there is a case of the Calcutta High Court, Udit Narayan Jha v. Musammat Jasoda Suhun Kalan (4), which is on all fours with the present case and which entirely supports the view of the law which I have taken.

In my opinion the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge is correct and I would dismiss this appeal with costs.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 49 OF 1917.

March 16, 1918.

MA SHIN MIN AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—APPELLANTS

versus

BA THAUNG AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Buddhist Law, Burmese—Payin property—House built during coverture on payin property, ownership of.

A house built, during coverture, on the payin property of the husband or wife becomes the joint property of the husband and wife, and neither can oust the other from possession. [p 226, cols. 1 & 2]

Mr. Lentaigne, for the Appellants.

Mr. Doctor, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Although the prayer in the plaint is for ejectment, the suit is one for possession of two holdings of land on one of which stands a house. Plaintiff (who now is dead) sued his wife Ma Shin Min for possession of these holdings together with the house on one of them, namely holding No. 23, on the ground that the properties were his payin acquired before he married Ma Shin Min. Defendant Ma Shin Min claimed that they were acquired during coverture with her. Ma Kyin Yu and Maung Kein Gaung were also made defendants, as Ma Shin Min had sold her half share in the properties to them.

Both the lower Courts found that the lands were the payin property of the plaintiff.

The lower Appellate Court omitted to decide the question as to whether the house was also the payin of the plaintiff or not. The trial Court held that the house was the joint property of plaintiff and defendant Ma Shin Min, on the ground that the plaintiff had admitted that the house was built while he was living with defendant Ma Shin Min. I think this finding as to the house was correct.

The facts then are, first, that the lands belonged to plaintiff solely and defendant Ma Shin Min had no interest in them during plaintiff's lifetime, and secondly, that the house belonged jointly to the plaintiff and Ma Shin Min.

The conclusion of law from the fact found as to the lands is that plaintiff would be entitled to get possession of the lands from Ma Shin Min and any sale by her of them was void. There is really no dispute regarding this conclusion. There is, however, a dispute as to the effect as to the house. It has been contended on behalf of the defendants that plaintiff was not entitled to turn them out of the house. In Bandacharya v. Shrinivasacharya (1) Jenkins, C. J., and Aston, J., followed the law as laid down in the English case of Culley v. Doe d. Taylerson (2) which is as follows:—"Generally speaking, one tenant in-common cannot maintain an ejectment against another tenant-in-common, because the possession of one tenant in-common is the possession of the other, and, to enable the party complaining to maintain an ejectment there must be an ouster of the party complaining." This ruling was followed by the same learned Chief Justice and another Judge, Batty, J., in Gangadhar v. Parashram (3). In Buddhist Law husband and wife are often described as partners, and I think they may, as regards their joint immoveable property, be regarded as tenants-in-common, or to use language which would suit our system of landholding, which is not exactly the same as the English system, owners-in common. On the analogy of the law laid down in the cases cited above, I think it right to hold that the plaintiff was not entitled to oust defendant Ma Shin Min from the house, unless he could prove that he had been ousted by her. The case was not contested on the basis of his ouster. Nor is there any evidence on the record to that effect. I, therefore, hold that the plaintiff was entitled to get possession of the lands, but not of the house from the defendants.

I may here state that it is clear that the maxim of English Law, quicquid inædificatur solo, solo cedit, does not apply to this case. See Beni Ram v. Kundan Lal (4) and Ma San Shwe v. Vulliappa (5). The decree of the lower Courts will be modified accordingly.

The appeal was on the whole case, and the defendants-appellants have been partially successful. Each party will pay its own costs throughout.

Landlord and tenant—Ejectment—Notice—Tenant asserting particular form of tenancy—Denial of landlord's title—Notice, whether indispensable.

Inasmuch as the necessity for notice is an incident of tenancy before a tenant can be evicted, the mere fact that a tenant asserts that his tenancy is of one type although it turns out to be of quite a different type is no ground for dispensing with such notice. [p. 227, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decision of the Assistant Judge at Ahmedabad, in Appeal No. 145 of 1916, modifying the decree passed by the Subordinate Judge at Dholka, in Civil Suit No. 182 of 1914.

Mr. H. V. Divatia, for the Appellants.

JUDGMENT—The facts in this case are somewhat complicated. But for the purposes of this second appeal the facts which emerge are these:—

The plaintiffs are now, and at the date of the suit were, the owners of the land in suit. They sued to eject the defendants. Out of the defendants those with whom we are concerned are defendants Nos. 1 and 3 who are in occupation of the land. They claimed to be there as permanent tenants. They appear to have been or they pretended to be uncertain as to who was their landlord, but that uncertainty is now removed. If they are tenants, their landlords are the plaintiffs. They claimed that they were permanent tenants, and this fact certainly emerges, that they are either permanent tenants or annual tenants, and in either event they are entitled to notice.

The trial Court came to the conclusion that the tenancy had not been legally determined by proper notice and dismissed the suit.

The plaintiffs appealed to the District Court, and the Disiriot Court held that as to half the land the defendants were permanent tenants and could not be evicted. As to the other half the Court held that they could be evicted and made a decree accordingly.

It is the defendants who have appealed here. The plaintiffs, though notice was served on them, did not put in an appearance. The facts which I have to accept are that as regards the half of the land of which they are not permanent tenants the defendants are tenants apparently holding under an annual tenancy and, think there can be no doubt that as such they are entitled to notice before eviction. The Judge in appeal said: "In all these circumstances I do not think any previous notice was necessary." It is rather unfortunate that the point was not dealt with a little more fully, because the circumstances are numerous and somewhat complicated. But, as I have said, they result in this: that the defendants were holding as tenants, and as tenants, it seems to me, they were entitled to notice. In the case of Vithu v. Dhondi (1) we have a discussion of the question whether an assertion by a tenant that he is a permanent tenant, whereas in reality he is only an annual tenant, is a denial of the landlord's title such as to make eviction without notice lawful—I mean of course eviction by order of the Court. The discussion resulted in an expression of opinion that was not very definite. But though not very definite, it was undoubtedly to the effect that in such a case notice could not be dispensed with. I cannot take that decision as a binding authority, because of its tentative character. But it seems to me that it was right. It seems to me that where you have a tenant who is in the ordinary course of events entitled to notice, he cannot be lawfully evicted without notice, merely because he asserts that his tenancy is of one type although it turns out to be of a different type. The necessity for the notice is an incident of tenancy and it seems to me that as it attaches to a tenancy, whether annual or permanent, it cannot be dispensed with although the tenant may assert that he is a permanent tenant, whereas in reality he is only an annual tenant.

For that reason it seems to me that the decision of the first Court is correct and that the decision of the Appellate Court in this matter of notice was incorrect.

I need not trouble myself to discriminate between facts which have been found by the first Court and facts which have been found by the Appellate Court. The result, under the law applicable to the case, is that the suit has to be dismissed, because the suit is a suit to recover possession and the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover possession. They are not entitled to recover possession of half the land, because as to that half the defendants Nos. 1 and 3 are permanent tenants. They are not entitled to recover possession of the remaining half, because whatever the nature of their tenancy, the defendants have not been served with a proper notice.

The appeal is, therefore, allowed, and the suit is dismissed with costs throughout.

JUDGMENT.

LORD MOULTON.—This is an appeal against the judgment and decree of the High Court of Judicature at Madras, dated the 28th October 1915, which affirmed the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Tuticorin, dated the 15th April 1913. The suit was brought by the plaintiff to recover possession of certain properties and for declarations of the invalidity of the mortgages upon them, and the defendants are persons claiming right to the said properties or interests therein under the said mortgages.

The sole question before their Lordships is as to the plaintiff's title to the lands in question. It rests solely upon a certain document described as a Will. Both the Courts below have held that this document is not a Will but is wholly of a non-testamentary character. It is not contested that if this is the case the document is invalid and gives no title to the plaintiff, because it was not registered and did not bear the stamp which would be necessary if it was a transference of the property in question inter vivos. The sole question, therefore, that their Lordships have to decide is as to the nature of this document which bears date the 8th March 1892.

At that date Vaikunta Nadar was the owner of the properties and as he had no male child he had resolved to adopt a boy somewhat distantly related to him, who is the present plaintiff, Tirugnanapal, and it was in connection with this proposed adoption that the document was written. It styles itself a Will, and so far as is relevant is in the following terms:—

"The Will executed this day, the 8th March 1892, corresponding to 27th Masi of Andu 1067 by Vaikunta Nadar, son of Vaikunta Nadar of Nattati village, Tenkarai Taluq, Tinnevelly District, to the boy adopted by me, whose name I have this day changed into Vaikunta Nadar from that known as Tirugnanapal, son of Periasami Nadar of the said village, is as follows: As I have no male heir though I married two wives, as I have been falling ill very frequently, as my family is a respectable family entitled for several generations to respect (greatness) and to the income of the headship of the caste, including Nattamai and title to worship by my castemen, for that purpose and for enjoying the property and in regard to another consideration, viz., that for obtaining the fruit of this birth, according to the Hindu Sastras, it would not do without a male child, I have, out of my free will, executed this Will pursuant to the request of my castemen and after consultation with my mother and my wives. And you are to conduct yourself according to it as follows:

"From this day forward you shall be my child and live with me; and out of the properties belonging to me and included in my patta and situate in the villages of Nattati, Perunkulam, Sayalapuram and Kattalankulam in Tenkarai Sub-District and Taluq, Tinnevelly District, and in Allikulam, Ottapidaram Taluq, the lands in Schedule I belonging to my mother as her stridhanam and enjoyed by her, but included in my patta according to the original old usage, and the properties in Schedule II which had been assigned to her for the income of the stridhanam (property) according to the direction of my father and which are in her enjoyment," she should enjoy as usual ; the properties in Schedule III which were gifted by me to my young sister Ponnammi Nadathi as stridhanam at her marriage, according to father's direction and which she has been enioying, she should enjoy as usual ; excluding the properties which shall belong to them all the other properties in Schedule IV and included in my patta you are to live with me and enjoy ; if perhaps I should die (attain Sivaloka) you are to live with my mother and first wife and you are to perform the funeral ceremonies for me, my mother and my wives, spending money according to our position ; you are to obey my mother, who has been from the beginning the protector (manager) of the family, and be under her protection and conduct yourself according to her wishes (will); if perhaps there should be disagreement between my mother and my wife and they should not pull on together amicably then you shall be under my mother's protection, and shall give my daughter stridhanam similar to that given to my sister and, like unto her, present her jewels for Rs. 2,000, get her married to my sister's son, and shall incur the expenses subsequent to marriage, without derogation (to position) according to the caste usage ; though my junior wife has left me (deserted me) you shall perform her funeral ceremonies and incur the expenses therefor ; if my senior wife is not willing to live with you and my mother, then you shall allot to her land and palmyras yielding an annual income of Rs. 200 to be enjoyed by her to meet her expenses ; the palmyras, odais and other trees standing on the lands in the above schedule shall be enjoyed by each according to his or her enjoyment of the lands; in addition to your acting as stated above in regard to my creditors you shall pay them from the profits of the properties without any diminution to the original properties themselves, and if they are not sufficient, then you shall make up for it by hypothecating the property (Senkulivayal) according to my mother's wishes."

Then follow the four schedules of properties referred to in the document.

The only circumstance which need be borne in mind in construing this document is that it is admitted that it was the intention at that time of Vaikunta Nadar to adopt the plaintiff, but that this intention was never carried out.

The first point to be remarked is that although the document is called a Will it is addressed to the plaintiff, and it speaks of him as having been already adopted, and directs him to conduct himself according to the Will. In substance, therefore, it purports to be a direction to the plaintiff as to his personal conduct in his new position. The impression thus made by the early words of the document is confirmed by the whole of the rest of it. Its directions apply from the moment of its execution and relate first to his behaviour during the lifetime of Vaikunta Nadar, and afterwards to his behaviour after the death of Vaikunta Nadar, but there is nothing whatever in the nature of a testamentary devise to take effect on the death of Vaikunta Nadar and not until then.

But on examination, the direct evidence that it was intended to operate de presenti is clear and unmistakable. It commences by the statement "from this day forward you shall be my child and live with me" and after directing that the allowances to his mother and younger sister should continue, it says, "all the other properties in Schedule IV and included in my patta you are to live with me and enjoy." Then follows the only reference to Vaikunta Nadar's death that appears in the document. So far from indicating that the document is then first to take effect, it refers to the death almost incidentally in the words "if perhaps I should die" and follows that up with direction as to his living with his mother and conducting himself according to her wishes. It is true that it also contains directions as to his giving allowances to Vaikunta's daughter, and other persons, but considering that by the adoption the plaintiff would become the head of the house after the death of Vaikunta Nadar, there is nothing in these directions which is inconsistent with its being a mere expression of his wishes as to the conduct of the newly adopted son in the position which he was to occupy.

To sum up, in their Lordships' opinion the only words contained in the document which would support its being regarded as a document of a testamentary character are that in some places it styles itself a Will. But calling a document a Will does not make it so and in their Lordships' opinion it is not of a testamentary character in any respect, and that if it has any legal effect whatever it is of the nature of a transaction inter vivos, and as such has admittedly no validity. But their Lordships have great doubts whether it purports to be anything more than a declaration of the intended adoption of the plaintiff and a statement of the wishes of Vaikunta Nadar thereafter.

Their Lordships will therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed, and that the appellant should pay the costs.

ALLAHABAD HIGH COURT.

STAMP REFERENCE IN SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 801 OF 1920.

June 12, 1920.

Present :—Mr. Justice Tudball.

SHIB DAYAL—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

versus

MEHARBAN AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Court-fees—Mortgage, suit on—Money-decree—Appeals by both parties—Second appeals, two, by mortgagee—Court-fee payable.

Plaintiff mortgagee brought a suit on foot of his mortgage. The Court of first instance gave him only a simple money-decree. Both parties appealed: the defendant mortgagor's appeal was accepted and the plaintiff's was dismissed. Plaintiff filed two appeals against the two decrees:

Held, that although both the appeals arose out of the same suit, they were two distinct and separate appeals and there was nothing in the Court Fees Act to empower the Court to consolidate the appeals and that full Court-fees must, therefore, be paid on each of them. [p. 231, cols. 1 & 2.]

FACTS appear from the following Report of the Stamp Officer:—

"This was a suit for recovery of Rs. 1,578-12 6 on account of principal and interest due on the mortgage of 16th November 1905 by enforcement of hypothecation lien. A Court fee of Rs. 105 was paid on the plaint, on the amount claimed. The Court of first instance dismissed the claim against the mortgaged property, but it gave the plaintiff a personal decree directing the plaintiff to realize the amount in suit with costs and future interest from the assets of Gokul, deceased debtor.

Against the decree of the Court of first instance there were two appeals to the lower Appellate Court, one by the plaintiff (No. 1 of 1920) seeking for a decree for sale of the property mortgaged, and the other by the defendants (No. 3 of 1920) against the personal decree passed against them. Both appeals were valued at Rs. 1,578-12-6 and a Court-fee of Rs. 105 was paid on each appeal.

The lower Appellate Court dismissed the plaintiff's appeal (No. 1 of 1920) and allowing the defendants' appeal (No. 3 of 1920). It dismissed the plaintiff's suit. The effect of the decree of the lower Appellate Court was that the personal decree granted to the plaintiff by the Court of first instance was set aside.

Against the decree of the lower Appellate Court the plaintiff has filed two appeals to this Court against the two decrees passed by the lower Appellate Court. On the appeal which is against the decree of the lower Appellate Court passed on the plaintiff's appeal (No. 1 of 1920), seeking for a decree for sale of the property mortgaged, the plaintiff has paid full ad valorem Court fee of Rs. 105 on Rs. 1,578-12-6, the amount claimed in the plaint; and on the other appeal which is against the decree of the lower Appellate Court passed on the defendants' appeal (No. 3 of 1920), dismissing the suit and thus setting aside the personal decree passed by the Court of first instance the plaintiff has paid a Court-fee of Rs. 2 although the appeal is valued at Rs. 1,578 12 6. The grounds taken in both appeals are identical. In the grounds taken in both the appeals the plaintiff in the first instance contends for a decree for enforcement of the hypothecation lien and, in the alternative, for a personal decree for the amount claimed. The question for consideration is whether full ad valorem Court fee of Rs. 105 ought to be paid in each appeal or only one Court-fee on both appeals. If it is held that only one Court-fee is payable, then both the appeals are sufficiently stamped; but if it is held otherwise, then a deficiency of Rs. 103 must be paid on the appeal which is against the decree of the lower Appellate Court passed on the defendants' appeal (No. 3 of 1920).

I am unable to find out any authority justifying the payment of a Court-fee of Rs. 2 on one of the appeals and, unless the learned Vakil is able to show any authority justifying his action, a deficiency of Rs. 103 must be paid on that appeal."

Messrs. M. L. Agarwala and Gulzari Lal, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—This is a reference by the Taxing Officer. The facts are simple. The plaintiff, who is the appellant in both the appeals which have been filed, brought a suit to enforce a mortgage against the opposite party. The Court of first instance held that the remedy against the property was barred by time but that the plaintiff was entitled to a money-decree against the present defendant. It accordingly granted that class of decree to the plaintiff. With this decree the plaintiff was not satisfied. He appealed to the District Judge, maintaining that he was entitled to a decree for sale of the property mortgaged. The defendant also was dissatisfied with the decree and he also appealed to the District Judge pleading that the plaintiff was not even entitled to a simple money-decree. The District Judge dismissed the plaintiff's appeal and allowed the defendants' appeal, with the result that the plaintiff's suit stood dismissed completely. From both these appeals the plaintiff has filed two separate appeals in this Court. This apparently is necessary to prevent the operation of the rule of res judicata. According to the report of the Stamp Officer the plaintiff is bound to pay full Court-fees on each appeal. It was urged, however, on behalf of the plaintiff that full Court fees should be payable only on one appeal and that a fixed fee of Rs. 10 should be payable upon the other appeal. He pleaded this in view of a remark of the former Taxing Officer in a similar case. It is true that the two appeals arise out of the same suit, but they are two distinct and separate appeals and I can find nothing in the Act which empowers this Court to consolidate it into one appeal and to charge one Court-fee. It is a pity that this cannot be done, as it seems unjust to make a man pay double Court-fees because under the law it is necessary for him to file two separate appeals. Still, one must take the law as it stands, and until it is amended, the law demands that on each appeal full Court-fees should be paid. Court-fees will, therefore, accordingly have to be paid on each appeal according to its value and according to the law as it stands. I allow the appellant one month within which to make good the deficieney in Court-fees.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 432 OF 1919.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 47, O. XXXIV, r. 14—Sale held in contravention of O. XXXIV, r. 14, whether void or voidable—Proper remedy—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 166—Mortgagor continuing in possession under rent-note—Suit by mortgagee for possession and rent, nature of.

A sale held in contravention of rule 14, Order XXXIV, of the Civil Procedure Code is not void but voidable at the instance of the mortgagor and in order to avoid it, it is sufficient for the mortgagor to show that the sale contravenes the provisions of the rule, and the proper remedy is not a suit but an application under section 47 of the Code made within thirty days from the date of the sale. [p. 233, col. 1; p. 235, col. 1.]

Where a mortgagor continues in possession of the mortgaged property under a rent-note passed at the time of the mortgage to the mortgagee, a suit by the mortgagee to recover possession of the property and the rent due on the rent-note is a claim arising under the mortgage within the meaning of rule 14 of Order XXXIV of the Civil Procedure Code. Second appeal from the decision of the Assistant Judge at Surat, in Appeal No. 165 of 1917 confirming the decree passed by the Subordinate Judge at Surat, in Civil Suit No. 16 of 1917.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—The plaintiffs in this case mortgaged the house in suit to defendant No. 1 in 1910 with possession. They continued in possession under a rent-note passed at the same time to the mortgagee. In 1914 the defendant No. 1 sued the plaintiffs to recover possession of the house and the rent due on the rent-note, and obtained a decree against them. In execution he obtained possession of the house and attached the equity of redemption in the house and one land owned by the mortgagors.

This land was mortgaged to one Bai Nandkore, who assigned her rights to defendant No. 3. Defendant No. 2 purchased the house and the land in January 1916: and both the sales were confirmed in March 1916. The present suit was filed by the plaintiff in January 1917 to set aside the decree and the sales held in execution thereof. For the purpose of this second appeal it is needless to state the allegations upon which he sought to set aside the decree and both the sales. It is enough to state that the trial Court dismissed the plaintiff's suit. In appeal the decree of the trial Court was confirmed: but for the first time the point relating to Order XXXIV, rule 14, was considered with reference to the sale of the house.

In the appeal to this Court the relief claimed is limited in argument to the setting aside of both the sales: and it may be mentioned at once that there is no error of law shown with regard to the conclusion reached by both the lower Courts as to the sale of the land. It is clear that the appeal, so far as it relates to the sale of the land, must fail. It was mortgaged to a third person and it was quite open to the defendant No. 1 as decree-holder to bring the equity of redemption in the land belonging to his judgment-debtors to sale.

As regards the sale of the house, however, it is urged that it is contrary to the provisions of Order XXXIV, rule 14, and that on that ground it ought to be set aside. Thus we have to consider the plaintiffs' suit so far as it relates to the setting aside of the sale of the house. From the facts stated above it will be clear that defendant No. 1, who was the mortgagee, obtained a decree in respect of the rent of the mortgaged property and brought the property to sale in execution of that decree. It is important to note that the purchaser at the Court-sale was not the mortgagee, but a third person, original defendant No. 2 The questions that arose with reference to the sale are; first, whether it contravenes the provisions of Order XXXIV, rule 14; secondly, whether the sale is liable to be set aside on that ground alone, and, thirdly, whether the proper remedy to set aside the sale is by way of suit.

As regards the first question it is urged on behalf of defendants Nos. 1 and 2, who are really the only respondents interested in this sale, that the provisions of rule 14 would not apply, as the decretal claim did not arise under the mortgage. It is clear, in my opinion, that the claim for possession and rent arose under the mortgage. No doubt the claim for rent as also for possession was based upon the rent-note, but the rent-note itself was the result of the mortgage and the claim based thereon must be taken to arise under the mortgage. The contention of the defendants is based upon too narrow a construction of the expression "claim arising under the mortgage." Such a narrow construction would unduly restrict the legitimate scope of this rule. It is true that the old section 99 of the Transfer of Property Act has been reproduced in a modified and restricted form in this rule; but even then I do not see how a claim arising under a rent-note passed by the mortgagor to the mortgagee could be said to arise otherwise than under the mortgage. In the present case there is the additional fact that the rent reserved happens to be equal to the interest due on the mortgage amount. The arrangement, such as we have in the present case, is very common at least in this Presidency; and substantially the claim made by the mortgagee on the rent-note is a claim arising under the mortgage within the meaning of the rule. This view is supported by the recent judgment of the learned Chief Justice in Ibrahim Goolam Husenbux v. Nihalchand Waghmal (1). The meaning of the expression "claim arising under a mortgage" has been discussed in Kadma Pasin v. Muhammad Ali (2). The facts in that case were different. But, generally speaking, the view taken by both the learned Judges in that case as to the meaning of the expression supports the conclusion that the claim made in the present case by the mortgagee in his suit against the mortgagors on the rent-note is one arising under the mortgage. Mr. Koyajee has referred to Bhyramshet v. Subraya (3). There is no written judgment in this case: the decree of the lower Appellate Court was simply confirmed by this Court. It is true, as pointed out by him, that a claim in respect of a lease was treated as not arising under a mortgage by the lower Courts in that case. But in the absence of any written judgment of this Court, it is difficult to know whether the point was argued at the hearing and decided by the Court. I may add that the decision in Haribans Rai v. Srinivas (4) which was referred to in the lower Courts in this unreported case, has been considered by the Allahabad High Court in the later case to which I have already referred. I agree with the lower Appellate Court that the sale of the house was held in contravention of the provisions of the rule.

The second question is whether on that ground alone it is liable to be set aside. The rule provides that the mortgagee shall not be entitled to bring the property to sale otherwise than by instituting a suit for sale in enforcement of the mortgage. I think it is clear on general grounds as well as on the decided cases that a sale held in contravention of the provisions of the rule is not void but voidable at the instance of the mortgagor, and that in order to avoid it, it is sufficient for the mortgagor to show that the sale contravenes the provisions of rule 14. Apart from the question relating to the remedy which the mortgagor has to adopt in order to set aside the sale, this point has not been seriously contested before us. The decision of this Court in Sahadu v. Devlya (5), the judgments in Ashutosh Sikdar v. Behari Lal (6) and Lal Bahadur Singh v. Abharan Singh (7) and the observations in Khiarjamal v. Daim (8) support this conclusion.

This brings me to the third question as to which we have heard further arguments, and which presents some difficulty. The question is whether a suit by the mortgagor to set aside the sale is competent or whether his remedy is by way of an application under section 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure to secure that result.

In connection with this point it must be remembered that in this case defendant No. 2, the purchaser at the Court-sale, is a third person and not the mortgagee himself, and that the suit, if otherwise competent, is within the period prescribed under Article 12 of the Indian Limitation Act. It is also important to note that in the present case the sale was held apparently after the usual notice of the Darkhast by the decree-holder to the judgment debtors; but they did not appear at any stage of the execution proceedings to object to the sale. At the same time there was no adjudication during the execution proceedings that the sale was not contrary to the provisions of rule 14. Thus for the purpose of this appeal it may be taken that though the plaintiffs were aware of the execution proceedings, they did not raise any objection to the sale before the confirmation thereof and that there was no adjudication on the execution proceedings as to the application and effect of rule 14.

It has been urged that the question as to the application and effect of rule 14, Order XXXIV, as regards the sale must be taken to have been decided against the appellants, as no objection on that point was taken by them in the course of the execution proceedings. But the point was not raised by the appellants in the execution proceedings; and apparently it was not noticed by the Court. The sale was effected in execution of the decree without any adjudication as to whether it was contrary to the terms of that rule. The argument is that a point which might have and ought to have been raised must be taken to have been raised and decided. The section relating to res judicata has no direct application to execution proceedings. The principle upon which the orders made in execution proceedings are held binding upon the parties is pointed out in the case of Ram Kirpal Shukul v. Musammat Rup Kuari (9). Their Lordships observe at page 41 of the report that the matter decided in execution proceedings "is binding between the parties and those claiming under them as an interlocutory judgment in a suit is binding upon the parties in every proceeding in that suit, or as final judgment in a suit is binding upon them in carrying the judgment into execution. The binding force of such a judgment depends not upon section 13, Act X of 1877, but upon general principles of law. If it were not binding, there would be no end to litigation." These observations show that it applies to the matter actually decided; and I do not think that on the facts of this case the point could be treated as having been decided on the analogy of the rule contained in section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code. It is open, therefore, to the appellants to raise the question as to the validity of the sale on the ground that it is contrary to the provisions of rule 14, Order XXXIV, in the present proceedings.

As regards the remedy, in the argument it was suggested that a suit would be barred by rule 92 of Order XXI. It was ultimately conceded, and quite properly conceded, by Mr. Kayajee that a suit to set aside the sale on the ground that it was held contrary to the provisions of rule 14, Order XXXIV, would not fall within the scope of the bar created by rule 92 (3).

The question is whether the remedy by way of suit or an application to set aside the sale under section 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure is appropriate. With reference to this point it has been urged on behalf of the appellants that in this Presidency it has been held that an auction-purchaser is certainly not the representative of the decree-holder and that he is not the representative even of the judgment-debtor. The decision in Narsinhbhat v. Bandu Krishna (10) has been referred to in support of this contention. I think it must be taken that the auction purchaser is neither the representative of the decree-holder nor of the judgment-debtor. It is further argued that if that be so, section 47 would have no application to any proceeding to which the auction-purchaser is a necessary party. It is quite true that section 47 applies in terms to all questions arising between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed or their representatives. It is contended that as the auction-purchaser is not the representative of any of the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed, section 47 cannot apply. In Prosunno Kumar Sanyal v. Kali Das Sanyal (11) it was held that the mere fact of the auction-purchaser not being a party to the suit was not fatal to the application of section 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1882. The following observations in the judgment are pertinent: "Their Lordships are glad to find that the Courts in India have not placed any narrow construction on the language of section 244, and that, when a question has arisen as to the execution, discharge, or satisfaction of a decree between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed, the fact that the purchaser, who is no party to the suit, is interested in the result has never been held a bar to the application of the section." In the cases of Pita v. Ohunilal (12) and Gokulsing v. Kisansingh (13) those observations have been applied to cases in which the auction-purchaser was a party; and the fact that he was not a representative of the parties to the suit was not held to be any bar to the application of section 244 of the Code of 1882. Section 47 of the present Code, which corresponds to section 244 of the Code of 1882, must be construed in the same way. In my opinion the observations of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Prosunno's case (11) afford a complete answer to the appellants' contention that section 47 has no application to the present case, because the auction purchaser is a party to the suit. It follows that the proper remedy is not a suit but an application under section 47 to set aside the sale.

Section 47, however, provides that the Court may, subject to any objection as to limitation or jurisdiction, treat a proceeding under this section as a suit or a suit as a proceeding. Under this provision it is permissible to us to treat the present suit to set aside the sale as an application to set aside a sale under section 47 subject to any objection as to limitation or jurisdiction. In the present case there is no objection as to jurisdiction, but there is an objection as to limitation which must be considered. If the present suit is treated as a proceeding under section 47, i. e., as an application to set aside a sale, it seems to me that it clearly falls under Article 166 of the Limitation Act of 1908. Mr. Thakor has argued that Article 166 really applies to an application under the Code of Civil Procedure of 1908 to set aside a sale in execution of a decree, which is expressly contemplated by the Code, as for instance an application under rules 89, 90 or 91 of Order XXI. He has also referred to Articles 166 and 172 of the Limitation Act of 1877, as supporting his contention that the application of the present Article 166 is limited to those cases which were expressly provided in the old Article 166. It is urged that there is no provision in the Code referring to an application to set aside a sale on the ground that it is contrary to the provisions of rule 14 of Order XXXIV. We have, however, to read the article as it stands and to construe the words in their plain and natural sense. It provides for applications under the Code of Civil Procedure of 1908 to set aside sales in execution of decrees. The present suit, which must be treated as an application under section 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure to set aside the sale, is an application under the Code of Civil Procedure to set aside a sale in execution of a decree; and it is difficult, without unduly restricting the plain meaning of the words, to hold that an application of that character is outside the scope of Article 166. It may be that the change in the wording of the present Article 166 is due to the circumstance that it is intended to include within its scope the old Article No. 172 in the Limitation Act of 1877, which is omitted in the present Limitation Act: and it may be that an application to set aside a sale on the ground that it is contrary to the provisions of rule 14, Order XXXIV, was not expressly contemplated by the Legislature. But the words of the Article are wide enough to cover such an application; and, in my opinion, it would not be right to curtail the scope of these words by reference to the previous history of this article, which is relied upon by Mr. Thakor in support of the restricted interpretation. I am, therefore, of opinion that the present suit must be treated as an application under section 47 to set aside a sale and that it is barred under Article 166 because it has not been made within thirty days from the date of the sale.

On these grounds, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs' claim to set aside the sale must fail.

The result is that this appeal fails and must be dismissed. The decree of the lower Appellate Court is affirmed with costs.

HAYWARD J.—I agree that the claim for possession and rent of the house did arise under the mortgage and that the sale of the house was voidable as contrary to Order XXXIV, rule 14 of the Schedule to the Civil Procedure Code. I also agree that the suit brought by the mortgagors to set aside the sale by the mortgagees was, notwithstanding the fact that the suit affected the interests of the auction-purchasers, a matter between the parties to be decided under section 47 of the Code of the Civil Procedure in view of the decision of the Privy Council in Prosunno Kumar Sanyal v. Kali Das Sanyal (11). It seems to me further impossible in view of that finding to hold that the suit did not fall within, and was not barred by, the wide words of Article 166 of the Schedule to the Limitation Act.

JUDGMENT.

JWALA PRASAD, J.—The facts necessary for the disposal of this appeal have been clearly set forth in the order of the Court dated the 26th March 1919, which is the subject of appeal before us, and may be briefly stated as follows :—

During the minority of the plaintiff a suit for partition of the family property was instituted on his behalf along with defendants Nos. 9, 10 and 11 and was numbered 3 of 1904. That suit was terminated by means of a compromise said to have been entered into between the parties. Subsequently the compromise decree was challenged on behalf of the plaintiff and his father defendant No. 8 and some other members of the family, who instituted a Title Suit No. 2 of 1906 to set aside the compromise decree on the ground of fraud and other allegations. The suit was dismissed for insufficiency of Court-fee and on appeal to the High Court the order of dismissal was confirmed. In that suit costs were awarded to defendant No. 1, who in execution of the order for costs attached the share of the plaintiff and defendants Nos. 9, 10 and 11 in the properties in suit.

The plaintiff having come of age has commenced the present action for a declaration of his joint interest in the property and his right to enjoy it separately and for having it declared that the said decree and sulehnama in Suit No. 3 of 1904 and the decree for costs in Suit No. 2 of 1906 are ineffectual, void and inoperative as against the plaintiff.

The reliefs claimed in the plaint are as follows : —

"(a) It be declared by the Court that the properties mentioned in the Schedules I and II of the plaint are joint ancestral properties of the plaintiff and defendants and that the plaintiff's share in them is one-eighth and the plaintiff holds possession of the said property in a state of jointness with them and is to have separate mode of enjoyment by separate possession of his share.

(b) That it be declared, if necessary, that the decrees in Suits No. 3 of 1904 and No. 2 of 1906 as well as the sulehnama upon which the decree in Suit No. 3 of 1904 is based are ineffectual, void and inoperative against the plaintiff.

(c) That costs of the suit with interest till realization and any other relief which the Court thinks the plaintiff is entitled to may also be given to the plaintiff."

As regards the valuation, the plaintiff states in paragraph 22 of the plaint as follows :—

"That the plaintiff's share in joint family properties mentioned in Schedules I and II of the plaint is one-eighth, whereof the value for the purpose of jurisdiction is laid at Rs. 1,915 6 2."

The plaintiff filed an application for issue of an injunction restraining defendant No. 1 from executing his decree for costs and from proceeding in execution and selling the attached property. This application was allowed and the sale of the property in suit has been stayed by the order of the Court, dated the 26th March 1919.

Aggrieved by this order defendant No. 1 has now come to this Court. The other defendants are not parties to this appeal.

A preliminary objection has been taken on behalf of the plaintiffs-respondents as to the competency of this appeal. The ground urged is that the value of the suit was below Rs. 5,000 and hence an appeal lay to the District Judge, and not to this Court.

The learned Vakil on behalf of the appellant resists this contention on the ground that the value of the suit is not what is stated in paragraph 22 of the plaint, but is the value of the entire properties mentioned in Schedules I and II of the plaint.

Dealing with the Court-fee leviable on the plaint, the Subordinate Judge, on the 18th March 1918, held that it was not a suit for a mere declaration or partition of the property but was a suit for a declaration with consequential reliefs and was governed by section 7, clause (iv) (c) of the Court Fees Act, under which an ad valorem Court-fee was payable. He found that the value of the entire properties in Schedules I and II was Rs. 22,500 and that of the plaintiff's one-thirteenth share therein was Rs 1,750. Accordingly he held that the valuation of the suit was Rs. 1,750 and directed the plaintiff to pay Court-fee thereon.

The question for determination before us is whether the valuation of the suit should be the value of the entire properties mentioned in Schedules I and II of the plaint, or that of the share of the plaintiff only in those properties, namely, the one-thirteenth share thereof. It is settled by authorities that in a suit for partition, pure and simple, where the plaintiff is in possession of his share of the property and simply wants to alter the mode of its enjoymant by claiming to hold his proportionate share in the properties separately from the other joint holders, the Court fee payable will be Rs. 10 only under Schedule II, Article 17, clause (vi) of the Court Fees Act. It has also been settled that where the plaintiff is out of possession of his share in the joint property, he is required to pay ad valorem Court-fee under section 7, clause (iv) of the Court Fees Act, inasmuch as it is not a suit for mere partition but for a consequential relief in the shape of recovery of possession of his share in the property. In such a case the plaintiff has to pay Court-fee upon the valuation of his share in the property.

There is, however, conflict of opinion as to what should be considered the value of the suit for the purpose of jurisdiction—whether it should be the value of the entire property sought to be partitioned or the value of the share of the plaintiff in the said property. The Bombay, Madras and the Allahabad High Courts have invariably held that in a suit for partition for the purpose of jurisdiction the value of the suit is not that of the entire property but only of the share of the plaintiff in the said property. The Calcutta High Court has, however, taken a contrary view [vide Wazih ud din v. Waliullah (1), Motibhai v. Haridas (2), Velu Goundan v. Kumaravelu Goundan (3), Lala Bhugwat Sahay v. Rai Pashupati Nath Bose (4) and Biraj Mohini Dasi v. Chintamani Dasi (5)].

In the case of Raghunath Parsad Singh v. Syed Yahya Hussain (6) in rejecting the application for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council this Court held that the value of the suit was that of the share claimed by the plaintiffs, and not of the entire property, and in doing so it approved of the principle decided in the case of the De Silva v. De Silva (7). Although the point was not directly decided in that case, the decision was certainly based upon the principle adopted by the Bombay Madras and the Allahabad High Courts. The learned Judges declined to express any opinion on the correctness of the Calcutta cases. The present case is still more distinguishable from the Calcutta cases on account of the consequential relief claimed in it. That relief is set forth in relief No. (b) of the reliefs detailed in the earlier part of this judgment for declaring void and inoperative the decrees in Suits Nos. 3 of 1904 and No. 2 of 1905, as well as the sulehnama upon which the former decree was based. This relief clearly comes under section 7, clause (iv) (c) of the Court Fees Act, and the Court-fee payable thereon is ad valorem on the loss to the plaintiff [vide Ganesh Bhagat v. Sarada Prasad Mukerjee (8), Ohinnammal v. Madrasa Rowther (9) and Wali-ullah v. Durga Prasad (10)].

Relief (a), properly speaking, relates to the declarations sought by the plaintiff of his interest in the property being to the extent of one-eighth share and of his right to separate mode of enjoyment by separate possession of his share. The plaintiffs themselves valued the suit at much below Rs. 5,000 according to their own shares in the properties in Schedules I and II and that valuation, as stated above, is mentioned in paragraph 22 of the plaint for the purpose of jurisdiction as well as for payment of Court fee, and the valuation of the relief made by the plaintiff should be the criterion in such cases for the purpose of determining jurisdiction unless the said valuation is wrong or arbitrary [vide, Phul Kumari v. Ghanshyam Misra (11), Ganesh Bhagat v. Sarada Prosad Mukerjee (8) and Bankey Behari v. Ram Bahadur (12)].

The lower Court had already determined in clear terms by its previous order of the 18th March 1918 that the valuation of the suit was Rs. 1,750, i. e, one thirteenth of the entire value of the properties mentioned in Schedules I and II. The valuation of the suit determined by the Court was for the purpose of Court fee payable by the plaintiff as well as for the purpose of jurisdiction. That order has become final between the parties and we must, therefore, hold that for the purpose of jurisdiction the value of the suit was Rs. 1,750, that is below Rs. 5,000.

The appeal to this Court is, therefore, incompetent and the memorandum of appeal should be returned to be presented to the proper Court.

JUDGMENT.

MILLER, C. J.—This is a motion by Motiram Marwari, the defendant No. 1, petitioning the Court to interfere by way of revision or superintendence with an order of the Subordinate Judge of Purulia, dated the 9th May 1919, refusing an application that the petitioner should be allowed to cross-examine the plaintiff's witnesses after their cross-examination, if any, by the other defendants. The suit was instituted by the plaintiff against the petitioner and four other defendants, claiming that the defendants should be ordered to execute and register a Kabuliyat in the terms alleged to have been agreed between the parties in respect to 150 bighas of land of which the sub-soil mining rights were already leased to the petitioner. Alternatively they claimed ejectment of the defendants, who have been in possession and paying rent up to the year 1915 but not since that date. The plaintiff also claimed for arrears of rent. The facts taken from the petition and the plaint are shortly as follows:—

The petitioner was the lessee of the coal mining rights in 150 bighas of land in Mauza Karkend under a lease, dated July 1898, granted by the plaintiff's predecessor, and has since been in possession working the coal under the style of "The Motiram Coal Co." The lessee, however, was only entitled to the surface rights in 30 bighas and was not entitled to cause injury to the surface. It became necessary, therefore, to acquire a lease-hold interest over the entire surface with power to let it down or otherwise damage it. Accordingly negotiations took place between the plaintiff as proprietor on the one hand and the defendants on the other for the grant of a lease of the surface soil. At this point in the story there is a serious divergence between the plaintiff and the petitioner. The plaintiff's version is that the negotiations took place with all the defendants jointly as co partners in the mine and that a sum of Rs. 2,400 was deposited by them as Salami in consideration of the grant, that a Patta and a Kabuliyat were drafted in the terms agreed to, and that the defendants were given possession and have paid rent up to the year 1915. The defendants No. 2 to 4 by their written statement do not deny the allegations in the plaint, except that they say the colliery is managed and the accounts kept by the defendant No. 1 and they do not know definitely what amount of rent is due to the plaintiff. They further say that they have never refused to execute and register the Kabuliyat and that they are still willing and ready to do so whenever required, and their case is that they together with the defendant No. 1 and the defendant No. 5 are partners in the colliery which is carried on under the style of "The Motiram Coal Co." The defendant No. 5 by his written statement contends that the lease granted to Motiram was taken by the latter not on his own behalf but on behalf of three firms in one of which this defendant was interested and that he has had an interest in it ever since. In all other respects he admits the allegations contained in the plaint and states that he is prepared to take settlement in the terms of the Kabuliyat filed by the plaintiff and that it is only due to the attitude of the defendant No. 1 that this suit has become necessary. The case of the defendant No. 1 as set out in his written statement is that he alone is interested in the property in question and that the negotiations which took place with the plaintiff were on his behalf alone, and that the agreement was that the plaintiff should grant a lease of the surface rights to him and that he undertook to execute a Kabuliyat in the terms agreed and has always been willing to execute such a Kabuliyat. He states that he has business relations with some of the other defendants and that any negotiations which took place through them and any payments which were made through them in connection with the lease were entirely on his behalf. It will be seen, therefore, that the only dispute in the case is one between Motiram and the other defendants and that so far as the facts in the case are concerned, the defendants Nos. 2 to 5 support the case of the plaintiff. In this state of affairs it having become necessary to examine the plaintiff and a witness or witnesses on his behalf before a Commissioner, the defendant applied to the Subordinate Judge for a direction to the Commissioner that he should be allowed to cross-exmine the plaintiff and his witnesses after the cross-examination if any, by the other defendants. The learned Judge said that he saw no reason to deviate from the ordinary procedure and refused the application.

It is contended on behalf of the petitioner that the direction of the Subordinate Judge would work great hardship amounting to a denial of a fair trial to him, if the learned Judge's directions are carried out. In my opinion the learned Judge failed to appreciate the real point for consideration in the case. The usual practice in cases, where some of the defendants support the plaintiff's case and others oppose it, is to order that those who support the plaintiff's case should cross-examine the plaintiff's witnesses first, if they desire to do so, and to call their evidence and address the Court before the defendants who oppose the plaintiff's case do so. Any other practice would be inconvenient and might work an injustice to those defendants who oppose the plaintiff's case. In the first place, after the opposing defendants have cross examined the plaintiff's witnesses, the other defendants who support the plaintiff's case would be entitled to cross-examine, and by leading questions possibly elicit evidence from the witnesses which had not been elicited in examination-in chief and about which the opposing defendants had no opportunity of cross-examining. It is true that if any new matter should be introduced, the opposing defendants might be allowed an opportunity subsequently of cross-examining about it but this would be a cumberous process and would unnecessarily prolong the proceedings. It is also manifestly unjust that a witness should be allowed to give oral evidence against a party who appears at the trial, when that party has no opportunity of cross examining upon the matters deposed to.

The question was considered by the High Court of Bombay in the case of Haji Bibi v. H. H. Sir Sultan Mahomed Khan (1) and it was there laid down that the plaintiff and such of the defendants as support the plaintiff's case wholly or in part should address the Court and call their evidence in the first place and then, following the words of section 180 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882, the other party, viz., the persons opposed to the plaintiff's case should address the Court and call their evidence. It is true that in that case the Court considered that the defendants supporting the plaintiff's case might have joined the plaintiff in the plaint. It is not necessary to consider whether the defendants Nos. 2 to 5 might have joined with the plaintiff against the defendant No. 1 in instituting the present suit, as, in my opinion, the principle relied upon does not necessarily depend upon the determination of that question and the decision just referred to was in fact based upon much broader principles; and the learned Judge who decided that case pointed out the confusion that might arise from allowing the parties to present their case simply in the order in which they appeared on the record. In my opinion in the circumstances of the present case the preponderating balance of convenience is in favour of ordering that the defendants Nos. 2 to 5 who are supporting the plaintiff's case should call their evidence and address the Court before the defendant No. 1, and in like manner should interrogate the plaintiff's witnesses before the defendant No. 1. This course would clearly result in a saving of time and will prevent any dispute at the trial as to the right of the defendant No. 1 to any further cross-examination which would undoubtedly arise if the order of the Subordinate Judge were carried out. It is also, in my opinion, in the interests of justice that the course proposed should be followed. The alternative course might result in the denial of a fair trial. Although no express provision is laid down in the Civil Procedure Code relating to this question, I think that in the special circumstances stated the Court under its powers of superintendence is entitled to interfere. The order of the Subordinate Judge will be set aside and in lieu thereof it is directed that the defendant No. 1 be entitled to cross-examine the plaintiff's witnesses after the other defendants have put such questions to them as they may be entitled to do and that the defendants other than the defendant No. 1 must call their evidence and address the Court before the defendant No. 1 proceeds to do so. The petitioner is entitled to his costs.

MULLICK, J.—I agree.

Public Gambling Act (III of 1867), ss. 3, 4, 10—Warrant to Police Officer to search—Warrant endorsed to another officer of equal rank and qualified to search—Search, whether regular—Person before Court under s. 10, examination of, legality of—Admissibility of statement.

The mere fact that an Officer of Police to whom, by virtue of his office, a warrant is issued by a Magistrate authorising a search under the Public Gambling Act, endorses the warrant to another Officer of Police of rank qualifying him to conduct searches under the Act, does not render a search conducted by that officer irregular and invalid in law. [p 241, col. 2.]

Where a person is on his trial for an offence under the Public Gambling Act, it is not unlawful for the Magistrate to examine all or any of the remaining persons found by the Police inside a house when it was entered under a search warrant lawfully issued under the provisions of the Act The fact that the persons are before the Magistrate within the meaning of section 10 of the Act, and that if they made a true statement it would tend to incriminiate them would not render their examination illegal or their statements inadmissible in evidence. Criminal revision against the order of the Sessions Judge, Allahabad, dated the 24th January 1920.

Messrs. C. Ross Alston and Ramanama Prasad, for the Applicant.

Mr. R. Malcomson, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application in revision by one Mahadeo, who has been convicted of the offence which may be broadly described as that of keeping a common gaming house, punishable under section 3 of the Public Gambling Act, Act No. III of 1867, and has been sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for two months. The case was tried summarily and no appeal lay under the law. The matter was brought in revision before the Sessions Judge, who has written a careful order dealing with the points raised before him and has found no cause for interference. Before me the following points have been urged:—

(1) That the search as conducted was irregular and invalid in law, and could not operate so as to give rise against the persons accused to the presumption referred to in section 6 of Act No. III of 1867, by reason of the fact that the Magistrate's warrant authorising the search had been endorsed by the Police Officer to whom (by virtue of his office) it was originally issued, to another Police Officer of rank qualifying him to conduct searches under section 5 of the Act. As pointed out by the learned Sessions Judge, this point is covered by authority in this Court, vide Emperor v. Kashi Nath (1). I have been asked to reconsider the soundness of this decision and my attention has been called to cases from other High Courts in which analogous questions have been considered. I think it sufficient to say that the Courts below were bound to follow the decision of this Court on the point and that I am not prepared to re-consider it.

(2) It has been contended that the house searched by the Police was not the house designated in the warrant. This is a matter of evidence, and I have no doubt that the house searched was the one intended by the warrant, also that it is adequately described in the said warrant so as to make the search valid and effective for all purposes.

(3) It has been contended that there was an irregularity in the conduct of the trial, because two distinct cases were taken before the Magistrate one against the applicant, Mahadeo, under section 3 of Act No. III of 1867, and the other against a number of persons under section 4 of the same Act, and it is suggested that the Magistrate, while purporting to try the two cases separately, only heard the evidence once. There is nothing on the record to support this contention and no affidavit has been filed. A statement has been laid before me by the Assistant Government Advocate as to what the Magistrate actually did. I cannot take judicial notice of that statement; neither am I bound to presume, in the absence of anything in the way of record or affidavit to justify the contention, that the conduct of the trial was marred by any irregularity in the examination of the witnesses.

(4) It is contended that Mahadeo was not proved to be the owner of the house in question, or at any rate that evidence not legally admissible was relied upon on behalf of the prosecution to prove his ownership. This point has to be considered quite apart from the question whether the house searched was the one described in the warrant. It is sufficient to say that there is abundant evidence on the record that, whether Mahadeo was the owner of this house or merely its occupier, he was at any rate a person who had the use of the house, and on the evidence he was using the same as a common gaming house. There is, therefore, no force in this contention.

N. DAR, B. A. LL. B., Vakil High Court.

(5) The most serious point taken, however, is with reference to the evidence given at the trial by two persons named Gobind Pragwal and Mohan, who were examined as witnesses called by the Court under section 540 of the Criminal Procedure Code at the trial of Mahadeo. These persons had been found by the Police in the house in question at the time of the raid and they were sent up as accused persons in the case under section 4 of Act No 111 of 1867. Within the meaning of section 10 of the same Act they were undoubtedly persons brought before the Magistrate who had been found in the house, which had been entered under the provisions of this Act. The Magistrate was authorised to require these persons to be examined on oath before him and they were under an obligation to answer truly all questions put to them. Nor could they excuse themselves from being examined as witnesses on the ground that if they made a true statement, their evidence would tend to criminate themselves. It would have been lawful for the Magistrate to examine as witnesses in the case against Mahadeo, not only these two men, but any or all of the remaining persons who had been found by the Police inside the house in question at the time when it was entered under a search warrant lawfully issued under the provisions of the Act. I find it difficult, therefore, even to formulate with precision the grounds on which it is sought to be contended that the examination of these two persons as witnesses at the trial of Mahadeo was illegal. In part the contention is based upon the suggestion, which I have already dealt with separately, that the trial Court in reality conducted one single trial, although going through the form of keeping the proceedings against Mahadeo separate from those taken under section 4 of the Act. In the main, however, the objection pressed upon me to the procedure followed in the Court below turns upon the fact that the Magistrate concluded by recording a formal order of acquittal in favour of these two men, Gobind and Mohan, in respect of the case under section 4 of Act No. 111 of 1867. I incline to the opinion that a formal order of acquittal required to be recorded, although it should probably have been done in a wholly separate proceeding. These two men had been produced before a Magistrate by a Police Officer as the result of an investigation conducted under the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code and of the Public Gambling Act No 111 of 1867. Section 11 of this latter Act merely says that the Magistrate, if satisfied that any person examined by him as a witness under the provisions of the preceding section has made a true and faithful discovery of all things as to which he has been examined, shall give such person a certificate in writing to that effect. Such person is thereby freed from all prosecution under Act No. III of 1867 for any thing done before that time in respect of any gaming in which he may have been concerned contrary to the provisions of the Act. This section in itself throws no light on the nature of the order required for the purpose of terminating the proceedings which have already been instituted against any such person as a consequence of the Police investigation. It may be that the Legislature which passed Act No. 111 of 1867 intended that the case of any such person should be treated as something sui generis and that the proceedings against him should be brought to a close by the mere granting of the certificate under section 11 of the Act. The Code of Criminal Procedure, however, would seem to require something more than this, if the proceedings initiated by the investigating Police Officer are to be brought to a formal conclusion under the provisions of the said Code. The probability is that the provisions of section 494 or of section 249 of the Code of Criminal Procedure should be brought into operation; but so far as the matter now before me is concerned, I do not think the point of much importance, because the effect of withdrawal of the prosecution under either of these sections would be an order of acquittal. So far as the question raised regarding the examination of these two men as witnesses and their acquittal subsequently to such examination has any bearing on the merits of this case, the point taken seems to be that Gobind and Mohan were in the position of accused persons on their trial before the Court when they were, it is suggested, transferred from the dock to the witness box for the purpose of being examined as witnesses, and then replaced in the dock for the completion of their trial. The suggestion is that they were thereby kept under duress or, at any rate, under strong inducement to give such evidence as they conceived the prosecution would desire of them. On the merits I see no particular force in this contention Whatever the procedure adopted may be in respect of a person whom the Magistrate takes it upon himself to examine under section 10 of Act No. II of 1867, that person remains liable to a prosecution in respect of the offence alleged against him when he was brought before the Magistrate until he has succeeded in satisfying the Magistrate that he has made a true and faithful discovery. Evidence given by such persons must, of course, be received with caution. It is usually the evidence of an accomplice and is always evidence given by a person who is under a certain inducement to make a statement favourable to the prosecution case in order to secure a certificate of indemnity for himself. These considerations bear upon the weight to be attached to such evidence but have nothing to do with the question of its admissibility. In the present case there may have been a definite irregularity committed with regard to the examination of these persons, Mohan and Gobind, as witnesses in the case under section 4 of Act No. III of 1867, but whether this was so or not I am unable to say. On the materials before me I do not see that the applicant, Mahadeo, has any ground for complaint as to the examination of these witnesses in the proceedings taken against him.

I dismiss this application. Mahadeo must surrender to his bail and undergo the unexpired portion of his sentence.

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 312 OF 1920.

July 15, 1920.

Present:—Mr. Justice Jwala Prasad.

EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 233, 239—Simultaneous trial of counter-cases, legality of—Accused, whether entitled to have trial set aside.

The Criminal Procedure Code contains no prohibition to the holding of simultaneous trials in counter-cases and the provisions of sections 233 and 239 of the Code are inapplicable to such trials, as a simultaneous trial is in no sense a joint trial, and unless it can be shown that the procedure adopted has prejudiced the accused in his defence, he is not entitled to have the whole trial set aside. [p. 245, cols. 1 & 2.]

Application against the order passed by the Sessions Judge, Monghyr.

Messrs. P. C. Rai and S. N. Rai, for the Petitioners.

The Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioners have been convicted by the Magistrate of Monghyr for the offence of rioting under section 147, Indian Penal Code, and sentenced to three months' rigorous imprisonment, with a fine of Rs. 50 each. Their conviction and sentence have been upheld by the Sessions Judge of Monghyr in appeal.

The riot is said to have taken place on account of a land dispute between the accused Bhojal Singh and the complainant, Majun Singh. The latter had purchased the interest of three brothers Ganpat, Gur Sahai and Nathu in certain lands, including the land in dispute, from Gur Sahai and Nathu, per sale deed dated the 18th June 1918. Ganpat did not join in that deed, and on the 6th June 1919 he sold his one third share in the land to the accused Bhojal Singh. The Courts below have concurrently held that Gur Sahai and Nathu had no right to dispose of the share of Ganpat and the title of Ganpat in the land was not, therefore, affected by the sale deed of 18th June 1918. Bhojal, therefore, had a valid title to the share of Ganpat, purchased by him in June 1919 But the Courts below have also concurrently held that the complainant was in possession of the property, though under an invalid title, including the share of Ganpat, and that the accused Bhojal did not get into possession of Ganpat's share in the property by virtue of his subsequent sale and that he attempted to take possession of the property by forcible means on the day of the occurrence, which resulted in the riot and injuries on both sides. Upon the aforesaid findings the Courts below have held the accused Bhojal and his party responsible for the riot and punished them as set forth at the outset of this judgment. The findings of the Courts below are of fact, and in revision it is not possible to upset them, unless it was shown that those findings of the Courts below are perverse on the face of them or based upon no evidence or misapprehension of the same.

It is, however, contended on behalf of the petitioners that the whole trial was vitiated on account of the simultaneous trial of this case and the counter case lodged by the accused Bhojal. In support of this contention, I have been taken to the authorities from the earliest time up to the present moment. It is true that there has been considerable divergence of opinion on the subject. The earliest case on the subject is that of Queen v. Sheikh Bazu (1). In that case, though the procedure adopted was condemned as irregular, it was held that it was not illegal and did not vitiate the trial inasmuch as no prejudice to the accused was proved, and as a matter of fact the trial and conviction in that case were upheld. Similar was the view taken in the case of Queen v. Surroop Chunder Paul (2).

Then came a change in the opinion in the case of Hossein Buksh v. Empress (3). The practice of simultaneous trial of counter-cases of rioting was condemned in that case and the conviction was set aside. Prinsep, J., held that "the course adopted by the Magistrate had materially prejudiced the interest of the accused." The learned Judge adhered to this view in the case of Chakowri Lall v. Moti Kurmi (4). The view was intensified in the case of Bachu Mullah v. Sia Ram Singh (5) (Petheram, C. J., and Beverley, J.) and it was clearly laid down that the mode of simultaneous trial "affects the validity of the conviction on it. In other words, that it must be presumed that the evidence was so affected by the circumstances, under which the witnesses gave it, that conviction must be set aside."

These cases were reviewed in the case of Queen Empress v. Chandra Bhuiya (6) which was originally heard by Pigott and Hill, JJ., and on account of difference between these learned Judges, the case was referred to a Special Bench presided over by them and Prinsep, J. The judgment was delivered by Prinsep, J. He was a party to the earlier decisions Hossein Buksh v. Empress (3) and Chakowri Lall v. Moti Kurmi (4) referred to above, so there can be no misapprehension as to the meaning of the decision in those cases. As a result of the survey of the authorities, Mr. Justice Prinsep held that a simultaneous mode of trial of counter cases of rioting, although irregular, would not vitiate the trial, unless the accused were prejudiced in their defence.

The next case on the subject is that of Pran Krishna Saha v. Emperor (7) (Banerjee and Handley, JJ.) decided in 1903. In the meantime the famous decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Subrahmania Ayyar v. King-Emperor (8) had come in. That produced very great effect in the way in which several Judges applied that case to the several provisions relating to illegalities and irregularities under the Code of Criminal Procedure. The principle of that case was applied to simultaneous trials of counter-cases of rioting by Banerjee and Handley, JJ., in the aforesaid case and it was held that the procedure is illegal and is not curable by section 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The case before their Lordships was one of a proceeding under section 107 of the Code. If their view is adopted as correct, the principle of that ruling will apply with greater force to simultaneous trials of cross-cases under the Code of Criminal Procedure. But the effect of the Privy Council decision did not last long, so far as the simultaneous trials of counter cases are concerned, and in the same year but later in the case of Sahadev Ahir v. Emperor (9) Ghose and Stephen, JJ., explained the decision in the case of Subrahmania Ayyar v. King-Emperor (8) as being restricted to the cases of joinder of charges in the same trial and not to separate trials of conter cases held simultaneously.

In face of this grave conflict of opinion it is a difficult task to decide which view is correct. Broadly speaking, the reason, upon which simultaneous trials of counter cases have been held to be illegal, is that the accused in one case will be very much prejudiced and embarrassed, if examined on oath as a witness in the counter-case, if both the cases proceed simultaneously. But this objection is not obviated by holding the trial of one of the cases and suspending, the other, till the disposal of the former, for even if one of the cases is suspended the accused in that case does not cease to be so and will equally be embarrassed, if examined as a witness in the other case. If the principle be applied strictly and abstractly, the result will be that none of the counter cases should be tried at all. The accused in one case is necessarily a witness in the other, and this unfortunate position cannot possibly be obviated by any mode of trial.

Now examining the point in the light of the statutory provisions in the Code, I do not find any prohibition of simultaneous trials of counter-cases and the learned Vakil on behalf of the petitioners has not cited to me any section of the Code.

Reference, however, is made to certain sections, relating to the joinder and trial of charges in Chapter XIX of the Code, notably sections 233 and 239. The former is an undoubted proposition that for every distinct offence there should be a separate charge and a separate trial subject to the exceptions laid down in the subsequent sections in the Chapter. One of those exceptions is section 239. I agree with the learned Vakil that section 239 has no application to the case, and the trial is not sought to be supported under that section. The charges in both the cases are separate and they have been separately tried. It would be doing violence to the provisions of the Code to hold that the accused were tried jointly together. They were studiously kept apart and separate from each other. The fact that they were tried simultaneously does not go to show that they were tried together and indeed "simultaneous" and "joint" are contradictory terms. Therefore, we cannot go further than holding that the trial in certain cases and in certain circumstances might be irregular and improper, but that would not entitle the accused to have the whole trial set aside, unless it was clearly shown that the procedure adopted had prejudiced him in his defence.

This takes us to the next contention of the learned Vakil on behalf of the petitioners. Some of the evidence has been read to me to show that the accused were prejudiced, but I have not been impressed at all with that argument. The criticisms made with regard to certain passages in the evidence in the case are not due to the simultaneous trial of the counter case. Those criticisms could also have been if the other case was not tried at all. The judgments of the Courts below have based their findings entirely upon the evidence in this case and, when reading them, one would not dream even of the existence of a counter-case. This shows how studiously the other case was kept apart in deciding the present case. In fact the accused were not prejudiced. This also is obvious from their acquiescence in the trial, without any demur or objection on their part throughout the trial. It is still more clear from the grounds of appeal taken before the learned Sessions Judge, where the prejudice due to the joint trial or to its being illegal or irregular has not been alluded to. The accused were, therefore, not at all prejudiced in the present case by the mode of trial adopted by the Magistrate.

The finding of the Court below as to possession of the complainant and the aggressive part taken by the accused in enforcing their supposed right based upon the sale-deed of June 1919 is supported by the evidence on the record.

The conviction must, therefore, be upheld. The sentence passed upon the petitioners does not appear to be severe. The application is rejected.

U. P. Excise Act (IV of 1910) as amended by Act (IV of 1919), s. 60A—Cocaine, illicit possession of—Liability of owner or occupier of premises in which cocaine found—Prosecution, duty of—Burden of proof.

The owner or occupier of a house who knowingly keeps an illicit supply of cocaine on the premises renders himself liable to punishment under section 60A of the United Provinces Excise (Amendment) Act, 1919, and no burden is laid on the prosecution of proving that the said illicit supply had been kept there for any length of time, or that the premises had been used for this purpose on previous occasions. The mere discovery of a phial of illicit cocaine, however, on certain premises affords only a slender basis for the inference that the owner of such premises, not himself residing there, knew or had reason to believe that the resident or residents of the house were breaking the law in this matter. Criminal revision against the order of the Sessions Judge, Allahabad, dated the 3rd October 1919.

Messrs. Satya Chandra Mukerji, Krishna Chandar Mukerji and Bhagwati Shankar, for the Applicant.

Mr. R. Malcomson, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is one of those cases, always somewhat difficult to deal with in revision, in which the trial Court and the Appellate Court have taken widely divergent views as to the effect of the evidence produced, although they have concurred in convicting one, at least, of the persons accused. The broad facts are that an Excise Inspector, along with Police Officers and witnesses, raided a certain house and searched it on suspicion that illicit cocaine would be found there. The result of the search was the discovery of a small phial containing adulterated cocaine and the prosecution of four persons as owners or occupiers of the house for an offence against the excise laws. The case was actually dealt with by the trial Court under section 60A of the United Provinces Excise Act, 1910, as amended by the United Provinces Excise (Amendment) Act (No. IV of 1919). The defence on the merits was that the phial in question had been planted on the accused persons, that is to say, that some member of the raiding party brought it with him in order to make certain, in any event, of a conviction. Both the Courts below have rejected this defence. The question is not really one which, according to the practice of this Court, is open to reconsideration in revision, and, as a matter of fact, I see no good reason for reconsidering it. It follows that an offence against the excise laws was being committed by some person or other in respect of this phial of cocaine in the house in question. The learned Sessions Judge has taken a view of the operation of the section under which the conviction was recorded which would make it very nearly impossible in practice to secure a conviction under that section at all. He has in effect inserted the word "habitually" before the word "uses," as it appears in the section in question. I feel bound to note my disagreement from the principle of law thus laid down. The provisions of the section in question are no doubt of an exceptionally stringent nature but they are intended to be so in order to enable the Excise Authorities to deal effectively with the illicit traffic in cocaine. As the section stands, the owner or occupier of a house who knowingly keeps an illicit supply of cocaine on the premises renders himself liable to punishment under this section, and no burden is laid on the prosecution of proving that the said illicit supply had been kept there for any length of time; or that the premises had been used for this purpose on previous occasions. No doubt the facts of each particular case require to be carefully scrutinised before provisions of this kind are applied, more particularly so in the case of an owner who does not occupy or personally reside in the place in respect of which the offence is alleged to have been committed. If the learned Sessions Judge means that the mere discovery of a phial of illicit cocaine on certain premises affords only a slender basis for the inference that the owner of such premises, not himself residing there, knew or had reason to believe that the resident or residents of the house were breaking the law in this matter, he is no doubt right. The question in this particular case really is, whether guilty knowledge on the part of all the four persons found on the premises at the time of the Excise Inspector's raid could not be inferred, as the trying Magistrate inferred it, from their conduct at the time of the raid and from the general circumstances of the case. However, the learned Sessions Judge declined to draw any inference of such guilty knowledge or complicity against three out of the four accused persons, and their cases are not now before me. The question is, whether the remaining accused, Durga, has or has not been rightly convicted on the evidence of having been found to be personally in possession of this phial of cocaine. The facts are that he was asked in the course of the search to open out, in the presence of the Police Officer, a certain roll of bedding which was found in a verandah room where the said accused had been sitting, in the company of a woman, at the moment when the Police raided the houses. Durga's own case is that he came upon this phial of cocaine somewhere in that roll of bedding and his defence, as I have already pointed out, was that it had been planted there by some member of the search party. The evidence as to what precisely took place at the moment when Durga either found, or professed to find, the phial in the bedding is, as might be expected, somewhat conflicting. The witnesses to the search were disposed, in examination in-chief, to speak in general terms to the discovery of the phial in the bundle of bedding. When they were pressed to say at what precise moment each of them personally saw the phial they rejoined, as might be expected, somewhat divergent answers. The witness Chunni Lal, for instance, admitted that the first he actually saw of the phial was that the accused Durga had it in his hands. He went on, however, to repeat his assertion that Durga took it from the bundle, but this is obviously a matter of inference on the part of the witness rather than actual observation. I am obliged, under the circumstances, to examine the evidence for myself and to form some sort of opinion of my own as to the general effect of that evidence. I certainly think there was evidence on the record on which a Jury might lawfully have found Durga guilty of the offence of which he has been convicted, namely, the illicit possession of this phial of cocaine. I am not sure that it is necessary for me to say more than this in a case which is before this Court only in revision; but I may add that the opinion I have myself formed, on a review of the entire evidence, is that Durga might well have been convicted on the charge as framed by the Magistrate, and that, in any case, it seems a fair matter of inference from the evidence that he was at least in joint possession, if not as the learned Sessions Judge thinks in sole possession, of this phial of cocaine. If the case were before me in the exercise of the appellate jurisdiction of this Court, the utmost that I should feel disposed to do would be to record a conviction, in the alternative, of illicit possession or of abetment of the offence of illicit possession. This being my view of the case, I do not think I am called upon to interfere in revision. A point is taken as to the severity of the sentence, but I see no valid ground for interference on that score. I dismiss this application. Durga must surrender to his bail and undergo the unexpired portion of the sentence.

Mr. Manohar Lall, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.

COUTTS, J.—The appellant in this case, Keshwar Gope, has been convicted under section 304 of the Indian Penal Code and has been sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for two years. The accused has been tried along with three others, Bihari Gope, Kokai Gope and Bunma Gope, who were acquitted. Bihari and Kokai are brothers. Keshwar is the son of Bihari and Bunma is the son of Kokai.

The case for the prosecution was that on the 25th March last, Jhumak Gope went to Chhabila village, where the appellant and the other three persons, who were tried, live, and called together a panchayet because Keshwar and Bunma had abused his son, Muni, for having allowed his cattle to graze their crop. Before the punches Ram Chariter, one of the witnesses, gave evidence of the occurrence regarding which the punchayet had been called, whereupon Bunma accused him of giving false evidence. Ram Chariter abused Bunma in return. Bunma then struck Ram Chariter with a small stick and Keshwar slapped him. Ram Chariter's uncle Lachman interefered and slapped Bunma. Bihari, Bunma and Kokai then slapped Ram Charitar and Keshwar picked up a bamboo which was lying there and struck Lachman two blows on the back and one on the head. Lachman fell down unconscious and was carried home. He died the next day about noon and the post mortem examination showed that death was due to fracture of the skull.

The occurrence is said to have taken place on the afternoon of the 25th and that evening after sunset, as Lachman's conditon appeared to be serious, Ramji Gope and Adhin Gope started for the Police Station, which is 10 miles away. They could not find the Police Station that night and spent the night under a tree. In the morning, they reached the Thana. The Sub-Inspector was either not there or was ill, it is not clear, but the Writer Head Constable made an entry of the statement of Ramji Gope in the Station Diary. This was about 8 A. M. Ramji Gope then returned to his village; shortly after he returned Lachman died, so he was returning to the Thana to give information when he met the Writer Head Constable at Mahamadpur, about a mile from his village, where the Writer Head Constable recorded what has been treated as the first information in the case. This was about noon. The Writer Head Constable after recording this statement went on to the village, where he arrested Keshwar, Bihari and Bunma and in the evening he returned to the Thana with these accused persons and also with witnesses Ramji, Adhin and two other persons, Budhan and Chhattu. He took up the investigation, with the result that the four accused were committed for trial and Keshwar, the appellant, has been convicted.

As I have already said, the post mortem examination showed that Lachman's death was due to a fracture of the skull and there is every reason to believe that this fracture was due to a blow from a bamboo as alleged by the prosecution. The question of whether this blow was inflicted by Keshwar and the circumstances under which it was inflicted, remain to be considered. The accused denied that there was any punchayet and stated that there was a quarrel between Kokai and the complainant's party over cattle grazing, in the course of which Kokai got hit on the head with a kodali. There is no evidence in support of this story, but it is a fact that Kokai was found by the Sub-Assistant Surgeon of Laheria Sarai Police Hospital on the evening of the 25th to have an incised wound on his head $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches by 1 inch by 2 inches which was caused by a sharp cutting instrument and it was clear that he had lost a good deal of blood. He had also two other slight injuries. Although then there is no evidence in support of the defence story, it certainly is clear from the fact of Kokai having been injured that the prosecution witnesses have not told the whole truth, and it is contended by Mr. G. C. Pal for the appellant that from this and other circumstances, we should find that the story of the panchayet having been held is entirely false. The circumstances, on which he relies, are that none of the punches told why they were called to form a panchayet, that it is unlikely that a panchayet would be called on account of two youths abusing each other, and that none of the punches interfered in the quarrel. These are all circumstances, which, it is right, should be taken into consideration, but in view of the first information, which was laid at 8 A. M., and of the oral evidence, which has been adduced on the point of the panchayet having been held, it seems clear that there was a panchayet. It is also equally clear, however, from the fact that Kokai was injured that the prosecution have not disclosed the whole truth about what occurred at the panchayet, and that they have not done so becomes a matter of considerable importance in considering what is really the main question in the case, namely, whether Keshwar struck the blow from the effects of which Lachman died.

Seven witnesses have been examined as to the actual occurrence and each of them states that it was Keshwar who struck Lachman, but it is contended by Mr. G. C. Pal that we should not rely on their evidence because it was not stated in the first information that it was Keshwar who struck Lachman and because the prosecution has withheld two witnesses, Budhan and Chhattu, who had stated to the investigating Sub Inspector, when they were taken to the Thana on the night of the 26th, that it was not Keshwar but Kokai who struck the blow with the bamboo. There is great force in these contentions. There appears to have been a complete misapprehension in the mind of the learned Sessions Judge as to what the first information in this case was. The first information in this case was the information, which was given by Ramji Gope to the Writer Head Constable at 8 A. M. on the morning of the 29th, the substance of which he recorded in the Station Diary. In this statement, it is merely recorded that Bunma, Keshwar, Kokai and Bihari had struck Lachman and Ram Chariter with bamboo. It would appear from the statement that all these persons struck him, and certainly there is nothing to suggest that it was Keshwar who struck the blow. This, as I have already said, is the first information, but the learned Sessions Judge has treated the statement made by Ramji to the Writer Head Constable at noon as the first information, and it is on this first information that the case that it was Keshwar, who struck the blow, is based. This, however, is not the first information; it is not even evidence and it should not have been considered by the learned Sessions Judge. It is merely a statement recorded by a Police Officer in the course of the investigation and the purpose, for which it was brought in, was to corroborate the subsequent statement of Ramji Gope made in Court—an entirely unjustifiable procedure. The admission of this document was objected to by the defence but it was admitted "subject to objection." The Court, however, never appears to have considered the objection with the result that a document has been used, which is totally inadmissible and which must now be excluded from consideration. Excluding this so-called first information, then, we have the first information recorded at 8 A. M., in which it is not stated that Keshwar struck the fatal blow and when this story first appears we do not know. It is impossible, under these circumstances, not to view the prosecution evidence on this point with grave suspicion. Another ground for treating the prosecution case with suspicion is the fact that the two witnesses, Budhan and Chattu, were not examined. These witnesses on the night of the 25th stated to the Sub-Inspector that it was Kokai, who had struck Lachman with the bamboo. No reason for not producing these witnesses is given. They were presumably eye-witnesses of the occurrence and important witnesses; it was the duty of the prosecution to produce them and the failure of the Public Prosecutor to do so appears to require explanation. It may be that their examination would have entirely changed the view of the case which was taken by the learned Sessions Judge, and their non-production, coupled with the fact that in the first information it is not stated that Keshwar struck the fatal blow and the fact that the prosecution witnesses have undoubtedly suppressed some part, at least, of the truth, throws so much suspicion on their evidence that I am unable to accept it.

I would accordingly set aside the conviction and sentence and acquit the accused.

DAS, J.—I agree.

JUDGMENT.—Khecheru presented an application to the Court of Mr. Nathu Ram, a Magistrate of the First Class of Meerut, asking for sanction to prosecute Musammat Choti for an offence under section 211, Indian Penal Code, on the 25th October 1919. The exact section is not given in this application but it appears in the cognate application filed on the same day. On the 21st November 1919 the Court of the First Class Magistrate of Meerut accorded sanction as applied for. It was brought to his notice that the sanction, so it was contended, should have been applied for from another Magistrate. In connection with this in his order granting sanction he writes: "It was just yesterday, 30th of November, I was relieved of the charge of the Sub Division of Sardhana and placed in charge of the Sub-Division of Hapur." The learned Magistrate referred Counsel to the ruling of Dalip Singh v. Nawal (1), which he appears to have found in what he describes as the Criminal Law Journal, Vol. 18, page 303. Choti then went to the District Judge of Meerut and applied under provisions of section 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code that the order dated the 21st of November 1919 might be set aside because the sanction had not been properly granted. The petition is headed as an appeal. This is a mistake. I am aware that a learned Judge of this Court in Bhadesar Tewari v. Kamta Prasad (2) has laid down that proceedings of this kind should be registered as appeals. But with all due respect it must be remembered that an appeal can only lie from an order when provided by the Criminal Procedure Code or by any other law for the time being in force. No suggestion has been made that "any other law" has provided an appeal in this class of cases. We are thrown back upon the Code. The Chapter in the Criminal Procedure Code which deals with appeals is Chapter 31 and nowhere within the bounds of that Chapter has an appeal been provided from an order passed by a Criminal Court under section 195.

It is true that in section 195, clause (6), a sanction given may be revoked by any authority to which the authority giving it is subordinate. Clause 7 lays down that for the purpose of this section every Court should be deemed to be subordinate only to the Court to which appeals from the former Court ordinarily lie. The word "only" contained in this clause is an important limitation and cannot be overlooked. It would be obviously incorrect to say that section 195, clauses 6 or 7, create an appeal from the Criminal Court giving sanction. I have dealt with this matter fully in Saligram v. Ramji Lal (3). The other learned Judges who were members of the Full Bench in which this decision was given did not dissent and may be taken to have agreed with the view taken by me, and I have had no reason since to be doubtful that the view which I then took was other than the right view. The Calcutta High Court in Ramadhin Bania v. Sewbalak Singh (4) and again in Hari Mandal v. Keshab Chandra Manna (5) has held that an application under section 195, clause (6), to the supperior Court is not an appeal. In this Court a learned Judge held that the right conferred by the sixth clause of section 195 is not exactly a right of appeal but is strongly analogous to such right: Ram Raja Dat v. Sheo Dayal (6). The learned Judge of Meerut had ground for dealing with the application as though it were an application in revision but passed upon it only the order "rejected." Now in more than one case this Court has pointed out that an order of this kind is not sufficient and should not have been made, and the learned Sessions Judge should bear this in mind and not content himself with writing merely the word "rejected." The Magistrate, however, was thoroughly cognizant of the facts of the case and has gone very fully into them in his judgment.

Musammat Choti has come here in revision. The grounds set out are (1) that the learned Magistrate who gave sanction had ceased to be the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Sardhana on the date he granted sanction and the matter should have been dealt with by his successor, (2) that the learned Magistrate should not have granted sanction under the circumstances of this case, (3) the judgment of the learned Sessions Judge is not in accordance with law. All these grounds are, in my opinion, entitled to little or no weight. As regards the third I have pointed out above. As regards the second ground I hold, after careful consideration, that this Court has no authority to revoke or to grant sanction in this case. The Court of the First Class Magistrate of Meerut is not in the words of section 195 subordinate to this Court. Appeals from Courts of the First Class Magistrates of Meerut do not ordinarily lie to this Court. I was referred to the words used in section 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. It was argued that the words "any of the powers conferred on a Court of Appeal by section 195" clearly lead to the opposite conclusion. There may be cases in which this Court would have such authority. As for instance if sanction had been given by the Sessions Judge of Meerut and this Court held that the sanction was not for any reason expedient or regular, it could, acting under section 439 in exercise of the power granted by section 195, revoke that sanction. But it does not follow that because it can exercise this power under one set of circumstances, it can exercise that power when such exercise would be in defiance of the limitation prescribed by clause (7) of section 195.

The question raised in ground No. 1 remains to be considered. The plea is that the Magistrate, having been relieved of the charge of Sardhana, could not pass the order he did. In this plea a "Sub-Divisional Magistrate" is spoken of as a Court. Section 5 of the Criminal Procedure Code shows that under that Code there are only 5 classes of Criminal Courts in British India. The "Sub-Divisional Magistrate" is not entered as being one of those five classes of Courts. The Court in this case was the Court of a Magistrate of the First Class of Meerut, and by section 12 the local area o Sardhana was defined as the local area within which that First Class Magistrate might exercise all or any of the powers with which he was invested under the Code. But except as otherwise provided by such definition, the jurisdiction and power of the First Class Magistrate extended throughout the District of Meerut. See section 12, clause (2). The mere fact that Mr. Nathu Ram was relieved of the charge of the local area or Tehsil of Sardhana did not take away from him the jurisdiction and power of granting sanction under section 195.

I had occasion to deal with this point in Mithani v Emperor (7) and in that case I held that the contention that all cases pending on the file of a Magistrate who had been relieved of the charge of a sub-division did not necessarily pass automatically into the hands of his successor, merely because the former had been transfe.red to another local area in the same district. I then pointed out that such procedure was obviously inconvenient. That section 12 of the Code of Criminal Procedure did not lay down any such automatic rule. To hold otherwise would be to overlook the provisions of section 40 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The present case was not a case of an officer transferred from the District of Meerut to another district. Furthermore to grant sanction was inherent in him as a Court of a Magistrate of the First Class. It was not a power with which he had to be specially invested and by both section 12 and section 40 his powers continued although he was relieved of the Sub-Division of Sardhana and placed in charge of the Sub-Division of Hapur. The language of his order shows that the application for sanction was instituted in his Court long before he was relieved of the charge of Sardhana, it was pending and had been pending for sometime. I hold that he was under the circumstances fully empowered to pass the order he did. I was referred to the case of Empress of India v. Anand Sarup (8), but in that case the Magistrate was under transfer from the original district in which he was to another and a different district. The case of Shaik Fakr-udin, In re (9) is also not in point and can be at once distinguished and is no authority in the present case.

(9) 9 B. 40 at p. 41; 5 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 27.

Over and above all this, granting sanction is not the trial or punishment of the offence charged. To make such a proceeding drag through several Courts is a mistake and in my opinion, the Procedure Code has very properly confined this matter to two Courts and two Courts only—the Court applied to and that Court to which it is immediately subordinate.

I fully agree with what was laid down in Baran Barai v. Mata Prasad (10). It is true that that was a case in which a Civil Court had granted sanction, but the underlying principle is the same and I am quite prepared to extend it to cases in which sanction was granted by a Criminal Court.

On every ground I dismiss the application. As the six months during which the sanction can remain in force expires to-day, under section 195, clause (6), I extend the time up to the 30th of June 1920.

Application against the order of the Sub-Divisional Officer, Begusarai.

Mr. H. L. Nandkeolyar, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Jogendra Nath Mitra, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application to set aside an order passed under section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Begusarai, declaring the first party in possession of the property in dispute.

The main ground, that has been urged by Mr. Nadkeolyar on behalf of the petitioners, is that there was no imminent danger of a breach of the peace to justify the proceedings of the Magistrate. I have looked into the proceedings and they are said to be founded on a report of the Inspector of Police, dated the 2nd November 1919. The Magistrate says that this Police report satisfied him that there was an imminent danger of a breach of the peace. I have gone through the whole report of the Inspector of Police, but do not find one word therein to suggest that there was any apprehension of a breach of the peace. The learned Vakil appearing for the opposite party has frankly conceded that no proceedings under section 145 could be founded on that Police report by itself; but he wants me to refer to the earlier reports of certain other Police Officers to show that there was a likelihood of breach of the peace between the parties. This I have declined to do on the ground that the Magistrate drew up the proceedings upon the report of the Inspector of Police dated the 2nd November 1919, and he did not found the proceedings upon any earlier report of the Police. This, in my opinion, is a fatal objection to the order that has been passed under section 115 and, therefore, it must be set aside.

I cannot allow, however, to pass one matter in connection with the final order, that has been passed in this case, unnoticed. The learned Magistrate has gone very elaborately into the question of title of the parties, much more, in my opinion, than a proceeding under section 145 would justify. A Magistrate in proceedings under section 145 is entitled to look into the question of title only to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion on the question of possession. He has got no power to decide the question of title or look into it apart from the question of possession. If he wanted to go into the question of title in order to effectively decide the question of possession, he would be perfectly justified in doing so. On the other hand, if the question of possession could be effectively decided without a decision on the question of title, he would not be entitled to go into the title of the parties.

Mr. C. Ross Alston, for the Applicant.

Mr. R. Malcomson, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The broad facts of the case out of which this application arises are as follows:—The accused Sada Ram borrowed Rs. 1,500 from one Sunehra on a registered mortgage-bond of the 26th of March 1914. He borrowed Rs. 500 more from the same man on a registered bond of the 15th of April 1914. The bulk of the money raised on the first occasion was applied to the re payment of two previous bonds, one of August the 11th 1913 and the other dated the 13th of January 1914. When sued by Sunehra on the two bonds of March and April 1914 Sada Ram pleaded minority. After a prolonged contest it was found that Sada Ram was in fact under twenty one years of age when he executed these bonds and that he had not attained majority, because his mother had been appointed his guardian under an order of July the 2nd 1910. It may be noted that in the guardianship certificate the date of Sada Ram's attaining majority (that is to say, completing 21 years of age) was given as September the 14th 1915. I do not think it is surprising that in the Civil Court proceedings Sunehra should have asserted, and endeavoured to prove that Sada Ram was in fact 21 when he executed the deeds of March and April 1914, but when he had lost his case in the Civil Courts he prosecuted Sada Ram on a charge of cheating. The Magistrate found that Sada Ram had in fact cheated Sunehra by dishonestly concealing from him the fact that his mother had been appointed his guardian and the fact that he had not yet attained the age of 21; also that it was proved against the accused, as a matter of fair inference, that he borrowed this money on each occasion from Sunehra without intending to re pay it and with every intention of pleading his minority as soon as a civil suit should be instituted. On these findings Sada Ram has been convicted and sentenced to imprisonment and fine. An appeal against the conviction and sentence was dismissed by the learned Sessions Judge of Meerut in a somewhat brief judgment. The matter has been brought before this Court on a petition of revision.

I think it quite clear that it was an admitted fact in the Court below that Sada Ram had not completed 21 years of age when he executed the two bonds in favour of Sunehra. At any rate this fact follows from the statements made by two defence witnesses called on behalf of the accused as well as from the statements of the witnesses for the prosecution. The whole question, therefore, is as to the intention and knowledge of Sada Ram at the time when he borrowed this money from Sunehra. It cannot be presumed against the accused that he knew what would be the legal consequences of the certificate of guardianship obtained by his mother in enlarging the period of his minority. The question is entirely one of evidence and of the inferences warranted by the established facts as to the course of conduct pursued by Sada Ram, from the time when he presented a certain petition in the Court of the Tahildar of Sardhana on the 2nd of May 1912 down to the execution of the second of the two bonds in connection with which he has been convicted. I have no doubt that the evidence given by the witness Seth Nandu Mal, as to certain transactions which took place on the occasion of the loan taken by Sada Ram from this witness, would be relevant under the provisions of section 14 of the Indian Evidence Act, as bearing on the intention, knowledge and good faith, or the reverse of the accused in his subsequent transactions with Sunehra. I feel quite satisfied after examining the record that the Magistrate has drawn correct inferences from the facts proved before him and that the intentions of the applicant, Sada Ram, in his dealing with Sunehra were from the outset dishonest. The case is covered by Illustration (f) to section 415 of the Indian Penal Code and by the explanation appended to the said section. There is a plea taken against the nature of the sentence imposed by the trial Court. Considering the nature of the offence of which Sada Ram has been found guilty, the consecutive sentence of imprisonment aggregating one year in all cannot be said to err on the side of severity. The trying Magistrate probably thought that he was dealing in the most appropriate manner possible with the case of this young man in sentencing him to a comparatively brief period of imprisonment, but by including sentences of solitary confinement he meant to increase the severity of the punishment and to decrease the period for which the convict would have to associate with ordinary criminals. I am not prepared to interfere either with the conviction or with the sentences passed. I dismiss this application.

An order, under section 250 of the Criminal Procedure Code, awarding compensation to an accused person without affording the complainant an opportunity to object to the order is illegal.

It is illegal to award imprisonment in default of payment of compensation Imprisonment can only be awarded if the compensation cannot be recovered.

JUDGMENT.—I accept the reference and set aside the order of the Magistrate, dated the 19th April 1920, directing the complainant to pay Rs. 20 as compensation to the accused and in default to undergo simple imprisonment for seven days under section 250 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

As pointed out by the learned Sessions Judge, the order is vitiated by the Magistrate omitting to comply with the requirement of the proviso to section 250, the complainant not having been given an opportunity to object to the order made. The awarding of imprisonment in default of payment of compensation is also illegal, inasmuch as under clause (2) of the section, compensation awarded is recoverable as if it were a fine, and imprisonment can only be resorted to on failure to realise fine under section 386 of the Code, as is settled by a string of authorities of the several High Courts [vide Rameevan Koormi v. Durga Charan Sadhu Khan (1), Byrabalu Naidu, In the matter of (2) and Lal Mohmud Shaik v. Satcouri Biswas (3)]. JUDGMENT.

SANDERSON, C. J.—This was a Rule granted by my learned brothers, Mr. Justice Chaudhuri and Mr. Justice Newbould, calling upon the District Magistrate and the opposite party to show cause why the order complained of should not be set aside. The order complained of was dated the 11th of December 1919 and was made by Mr. Indu Bhushan Mullick, Honorary Magistrate, 1st Class, of Meherpur, and, the order was that the second party in certain proceedings under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, should pay Rs. 834 as the costs of the case under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, to the first party. It appears that the original case under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, between the first and the second parties was tried by the same Magistrate, and the order which the Magistrate made was in favour of the first party and was dated the 2nd of June 1919. In the judgment which the Magistrate gave on the 2nd of June 1919 he made no order with regard to the question of costs. He gave no direction and his judgment did not deal with that question in any way at all. On the 13th of August, about two months and 28 days after the date of the judgment in the original case, the first party applied to the Magistrate for an order that the second party should pay the costs of the proceedings to the first party: and, the Honorary Magistrate after hearing arguments and after referring to certain decisions made the order to which I have referred. It is now argued that the Honorary Magistrate had no jurisdiction to make the order as to costs, inasmuch as it was not made by him at the time he gave his decision on the merits of the case on the 2nd of June 1919.

This matter depends in my judgment upon the words of section 148, sub-section (3), of the Code of Criminal Procedure. That sub-section runs as follows: "When any costs have been incurred by any party to a proceeding under this Chapter for witnesses, or Pleaders' fees, or both, the Magistrate passing a decision under section 145, section 146 or section 147 may direct by whom such costs shall be paid, whether by such party or by any other party to the proceeding, and whether in whole or in part or proportion. All costs so directed to be paid may be recovered as if they were fines." In my judgment that section does not provide that a Magistrate who gives a decision under section 145, if he desires to make an order as to costs, must make the order at the time he gives his decision on the merits. In my judgment as long as an order for costs is made by the same Magistrate who passes the decision under section 145, section 146 or section 147, he has jurisdiction to make the order.

The learned Vakil relied upon section 369 of the same Code which runs as follows: "No Court, other than a High Court, when it has signed its judgment, shall alter or review the same, except as provided in sections 395 and 484 or to correct a clerical error." In this case where the judgment, which was delivered on the 2nd of June 1919, did not deal with the question of costs at all, it cannot be said that the subsequent order of the Honorary Magistrate of the 11th of December upon this question of costs was an alteration or a review of the judgment of the 2nd of June within the meaning of section 369. So much for the question of jurisdiction.

The Honorary Magistrate seems to think that the delay in this case which was nearly three months was not unreasonable, having regard to the facts which he sets out in his judgment, one of them being that the first party waited to see the result of the High Court appeal which was presented by the second party. I must not be taken as agreeing to that. I do not understand why it was necessary for the first party to postpone the application for costs until after the decision of the High Court appeal. I do not propose to interfere with the Honorary Magistrate's order which he has made in his discretion, but I wish to make it clear that in my judgment an application for costs, if it is not made at the time the judgment is delivered, ought to be made within a reasonable time. What is a reasonable time must depend upon the circumstances of each case. Ordinarily an application for costs ought not to be made after so long an interval as two months and twenty-eight days, as in this case. As I have already said, I am not prepared to overrule the Honorary Magistrate upon a question of discretion. But if I had been sitting in the Court of first instance and this application had been made before me, I should have had great hesitation before granting the application, having regard to the delay which had occurred since judgment was given on the merits.

For the reasons which I have already stated in my judgment, this Rule should be discharged.

WALMSLEY, J.—I agree.

Hindu Law—Minor—Alienation by natural guardian—Minor, remedy of, on attaining majority—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 44.

Where a Hindu mother, acting as the natural guardian of her minor son, transfers property during his minority, the minor, in order to recover possession of the property so transferred, must sue to set aside the transfer, and such suit must be brought within three years of the minor attaining majority under Article 44 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act and if he fails to bring such suit within that time, neither he nor the next reversioner can dispute the alienation. [p. 262, col. 2]

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Belgaum, in Appeal No. 270 of 1917, reversing the decree passed by the Subordinate Judge at Belgaum, in Civil Suit No 100 of 1910.

FACTS appear from the following judgment of Macleod, C. J., dated the 3rd October 1919:—

"The plaintiff sued to recover khas possession of the suit property after setting at naught all the contentions of the defendant or to redeem the suit property after taking account of the mortgage. The suit property belonged to one Nana, who died leaving a widow Sidubai and a son Omana. Nana had mortgaged the property to the father of the defendant in 1877. Omana died on the 25th April 1901, leaving a widow Gopika who died in 1908. The plaintiff is admittedly the nearest reversioner and he sued to redeem the mortgage of 1877. It appears, however, that on the 1st of February 1891 Sidubai purporting to act as guardian of Omana sold the equity of redemption to the defendant's father.

The lower Court found that the sale by Sidubai was for legal necessity and dismissed the plaintiff's suit with costs.

In appeal the learned Appellate Judge considered that there was not sufficient evidence to show that the sale was for legal necessity, and it followed from that that Omana could have maintained the suit, in his opinion, for redemption. Therefore, he considered that the plaintiff as the nearest reversioner could sue for redemption, and passed a preliminary decree.

The question does not seem to have been argued in the lower Appellate Court whether Omana was not barred by Article 44 of the Limitation Act. The learned Judge seems to have assumed that the minor on attaining majority could have sued the mortgagee for redemption without first getting rid of the sale by his mother of the equity of redemption. This question was considered by my brother Shah and myself in Second Appeal No. 1001 of 1917, decided on 26th September 1919, and the matter was then very fully argued before us, but as we were of opinion that the sale by the minor's guardian was justified, we did not decide the point of limitation. Now, however, the same question has arisen again, and in this case, as it has been found that the sale was not for legal necessity, the success of the defence must depend on the question of limitation.

In Laxmava v. Rachappa (1) a minor's mother and natural guardian sold his property. The suit was brought to set aside the sale more than three years after the minor attained majority: it was held that the suit was barred under Article 44 of the Indian Limitation Act. Reference was made to the case of Balappa Dundappa v. Chanbasappa Shivalingappa (2). There the transaction which was disputed was a sale by a step-mother who purported to act as guardian of her minor step son. The learned Chief Justice in his judgment says:—

"It appears to us extremely doubtful if Article 44 of the Indian Limitation Act has any application in circumstances such as we have here. The step-mother cannot be in a better position than any other manager to deal with immoveable property which is not her own, as appears from the case of Hunoomanpersaud Panday v. Mussammat Babooee Munraj Koonweree (3) which was a case of a mortgage by a mother. A mother or a step-mother, whether a Hindu or otherwise, purporting to act on behalf of a minor son, is, to use the words of section 3 of the Transfer of Property Act, a person authorised only under circumstances in their nature variable to dispose of immoveable property, and the onus of proving authority arising from necessity or apparent authority arising from that cause, justified by reasonable inquiry, is upon the person who tries to assert the transfer against a minor"

Mr. Justice Beaman, in Laxmava v. Rachappa (1) said:—

"The case of Balappa Dundappa v. Chanbasappa Shivalingappa (2) and the case of Anandappa v. Totappa (4) with which we have been especially pressed are, we think, easily distinguishable. We need only mention the first of these cases and point out that the transferor was not the natural guardian of the minor at all but his step mother. The decision can then be put on the ground that the alienation was not by a guardian strictly speaking so at all, but at the highest by a de facto guardian who was not authorized to deal in any way with the minor's property."

If then Omana could not sue the mortgagee for redemption without getting the sale of the equity of redemption by his mother set aside within three years after attaining majority, it follows that the plaintiff as reversioner after the death of Gopikabai would be in no better position. But the decision in Anandappa v. Totappa (4) must be considered on this point, because the learned Judges there considered in what circumstances the plaintiff must sue for cancellation of a document which stands in his way of success, and in what circumstances he may disregard the document and sue for the recovery of the property leaving the defendant to show that the document on which he relies gives him a valid title. At page 1139* the learned Judges say:

"Whether a plaintiff must sue for cancellation of a document under which the defendant in possession claims, depends. we think, upon whether the onus of proving circumstances establishing its validity lies upon him or whether it lies upon the defendant to prove circumstances establishing its validity. For example, where a plaintiff sues to recover possession of property which the defendant has obtained under a document executed by the plaintiff or one under whom he claims, the plaintiff would have to establish facts entitling him to have the instrument cancelled or set aside and would have to sue within three years of those facts becoming known to him as provided by Article 91 of the Indian Limitation Act. On the other hand, where the defendant has acquired possession under a deed executed not by the real owner of the property but by some one having a power of disposal under certain circumstances on behalf of the real owner, the onus lies on the defendant to prove the existence of those circumstances, and the plaintiff may ignore the deed in bringing his suit for possession."

And later on the judgment proceeds:—

"It is argued, however, that the existence of Article 44 of the Indian Limitation Act implies that wherever a guardian has effected a sale of his ward's property, the sale is valid until it is set aside by suit. We are not prepared to hold that the existence of this article involves any qualification of the principles expressed in the judgment of Mr. Justice Woodroffe already referred to. The article possibly refers to cases in which a ward might sue to set aside a sale effected by his guardian with the authority of the Court, which would prima facie be valid but which, on proof of certain circumstances such as misrepresentation or fraud with regard to the guardian, might be set aside."

Mr. Justice Beaman in Laxmava v. Rachappa (1), although he says that Anandappa v. Totappa (4) is easily distinguishable, did not explain how he came to that conclusion. n the case before him the property in dispute belonged originally to one Mudkappa who was born in 1891 Whilst he was a minor his mother sold the property to Hushappa, husband of Laxmava, the 3rd defendant, on the 31st May 190 . After Mudkappa attained majority, he sold the property to Rachappa, the plaintiff, on the 25th September 1912, and it was Rachappa, who had bought from the minor who instituted a suit against the defendants in 1913.

But it was not considered in the judgment whether a minor or his vendee could sue for the recovery of the property without setting aside the conveyance by the minor's mother. The Court seems to have assumed that the plaintiff could not recover the property without setting aside the deed. It is unfortunate that the Chief Justice in Balappa Dundappa v. Chanbasappa Shivalingappa (2) does not refer to the case of Anandappa v. Totappa (4), which was mentioned by the appellant's Pleader during the argument. But I must say there is considerable force in the contention by Mr. Manerikar in this case that the passage in the judgment at page 1139* in Anandappa v. Totappa (4) applies to this case. The argument is that the minor could disregard entirely his mother's disposition. The equity of redemption had come down to him from his father. Therefore, he was entitled to go to the mortgagee and ask to redeem the property. It would be then for the alleged owner of the equity of redemption, who happened to be the mortgagee, to set up a sale-deed of the equity of redemption from the minor's mother in order to defeat the claim of the mortgagor to redeem. Therefore, the argument proceeds that it would not be a suit under Article 44 to set aside a transfer made by the minor's mother of the equity of redemption, as it would lie upon the defendant to prove that document in order to defeat the plaintiff's claim.

As this is a question which must be finally decided sooner or later, considering the state of authorities, it seems to me to be advisable that the appeal should be heard before a Bench of three Judges. If I referred a question to a Full Bench, my decision based on their answer to the question would still be appealable under the Letters Patent."

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—This appeal has now been fully argued, and an opportunity has arisen for deciding a question which has given rise to a considerable conflict of judicial opinion, namely, whether a Hindu minor on his attaining majority can sue to recover possession of property transferred by his mother acting as his natural guardian during his minority without suing to set aside the transfer and, therefore, coming within the provisions of Article 44 of the Limitation Act. That question was answered in the negative by Beaman and Heaton, JJ., in Laxmava v. Rachappa (1), where the plaintiff had bought certain property from one Mudkappa which had been sold by Mudkappa's mother during his minority to the defendant, and reference may be made to Mahableshwar Krishnappa v. Ramchandra Mangesh (5), where K as manager of the family appointed a Muktyar who sold Mulgeni rights. K's eldest son after attaining majority sued to recover possession, alleging that the sale was void. It was held that it could not be treated as a nullity and the right of the plaintiff to challenge it was barred by Article 44 of Act IX of 1908. But there are contrary decisions of this Court.

In Bhagvant Govind v. Kondi (6) the plaintiff sued to redeem land alleged to have been mortgaged by his father in 1858 to the grandfather of the 1st defendant. The defendant alleged that the mortgage had been executed in favour of the father of the 2nd defendant and that in 1863 the equity of redemption had been sold to the mortgagee by the widows of the mortgagor during the plaintiff's minority. The defendant contended that the suit was really one to set aside the sale of 1863 and was barred by Article 44 of the Limitation Act, XV of 1877. It was held that Article 44 did not apply as the necessity for impugning the sale of 1863 to the 2nd defendant arose from the 2nd defendant's resisting the plaintiff's claim to redeem the mortgage, and was, therefore subservient to the suit for possession. It was also held that the 2nd defendant, having entered into possession as mortgagee, could not afterwards set up an adverse possession as owner so as to defeat plaintiff's right to redeem: Ali Muhammad v. Lalta Bakhsh (7) and Tanji v. Nagamma (8).

In Anandappa v. Totappa (4) the plaintiff sued for a declaration that a deed of exchange dated the 15th June 1900 was not binding on him and for recovery of possession of certain lands. The deed of exchange purported to be between the plaintiff, a minor interested in his own right as the adopted son of a Vatandar acting through his natural father, and the natural grandfather of the plaintiff. The District Judge reversing the decision of the Subordinate Judge held that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to sue to set aside the deed on the authority of the decision of the Privy Council in Bijoy Gopal Mukerji v. Krishna Mahishi Debi (9). But that was a suit by a reversioner to recover possession of property leased by a Hindu widow. The decision of the District Judge was upheld in appeal by Scott, C. J, and Rao, J. They said: "Whether a plaintiff must sue for cancellation of a document under which the defendant in possession claims, depends, we think, upon whether the onus of proving circumstances establishing its invalidity lies upon him or whether it lies upon the defendant to prove circumstances establishing its validity." They then referred to the decision of Woodroffe J., in Harihar Ojha v. Dasarathi Misra (10). That again was a suit by a reversioner to recover property alienated by a Hindu widow. Woodroffe, J., relied on a passage in the judgment of the Madras High Court in Unni v. Kunchi Amma (11).

That was a suit filed on behalf of a Malabar Tarwad by two of its members to recover property improperly alienated under a Kanom instrument by the Karnavan.

It was held that since a prayer for the cancellation of the Kanom instrument was not an essential part of the plaintiffs' relief, the suit was not barred by the three years' rule in Article 91, Act XV of 1877.

The Court said: "In our opinion there is no distinction between this case and other cases where a similar charge is made in respect of an instrument of alienation executed by a person who, not being the full owner of the property, has a conditional authority only to dispose of it. Such are the cases of a guardian of a minor, the manager of a Hindu family or the sonless widow in a divided Hindu family. In these cases, as was argued by the appellants' Vakil, it is not only not necessary, but it is not possible, to have the instrument of alienation cancelled and delivered up because as between the parties to it, it may be a perfectly valid instrument. All that is needed is a declaration that the plaintiffs' interest is not affected by the instrument, and that declaration is merely ancillary to the relief which may be granted by delivery of possession." Reference was made to Sikher Chund v. Dulputty Singh (12), where Prinsep, J., said: "The fact that a guardian may have improperly sold property belonging to his ward, and may have embodied this transaction in a written instrument, cannot, in my opinion, affect the position of a minor seeking to recover that property, merely because a written instrument was executed. That instrument is between the guardian and a third party. If the guardian has exceeded his authority, the instrument is not the act of the minor, and it would not be incumbent on him to sue to set it aside, as in the case of one who has himself executed an instrument the validity of which he impugns."

But it must be noted that there was no article in the Limitation Act of 1871 which was then in force corresponding with Article 44 of the present Act.

In Anandappa v. Totappa (4) it was argued that the existence of Article 44 of the Indian Limitation Act implied that whenever a guardian has effected a sale of his ward's property, the sale was valid until it was set aside by suit. But Scott, C. J., said: "We are not prepared to hold that the existence of this article involves any qualification of the principles expressed in the judgment of Mr. Justice Woodroffe already referred to. The article possibly refers to cases in which a ward might sue to set aside a sale effected by his guardian with the authority of the Court, which would prima facie be valid but which, on proof of certain circumstances such as misrepresentation or fraud with regard to the guardian, might be set aside."

In Balappa Dundappa v. Chanbasappa Shivalingappa (2) the plaintiff sued to redeem a mortgage executed by his father, his step-mother during his minority having sold the equity of redemption to the defendant mortgagee. As plaintiff brought the suit more than three years after attaining majority, it was argued the suit was barred by Article 44.

Scott, C. J. said: "It appears to us extremely doubtful if Article 44 of the Indian Limitation Act has any application in circumstances such as we have here. The step mother cannot be in a better position than any other manager to deal with immoveable property which is not her own, as appears from the case of Hunoomanpersaud Panday v. Musammat Babocee Munraji Koonwerree (3) which was a case of a mortgage by a mother...The learned Judge appears to think that the question with regard to Article 44 is disposed of by the judgment of the Privy Council in Malkarjun v. Narhari (13) in which a reference is made to Bhagvant Govind v. Kondi (6). It appears to us that that conclusion is not correct, because the question of the powers of the so-called de facto guardian in relation to a defence of limitation under Article 44 was considered after exhaustive argument by the Privy Council in Mata Din v. Ahmad Ali (14) and the conclusion arrived at is that Article 44 has no application to the case of a de facto guardian wholly unauthorised to effect a transfer."

In Mata Din v. Ahmad Ali (14) a Muhammadan sued to redeem a mortgage, the equity of redemption of which had been sold by his elder brother, treating the sale as a nullity. The defendant pleaded that Article 44 of the Limitation Act applied but their Lordships of the Privy Council said: "Article 44 prescribes a period of three years within which a ward, who has attained majority, may set aside a sale made by his guardian, the time running from the date of the ward's majority. This provision has no application to the present case, for the sale here was effected, not by a guardian, but by a wholly unauthorised person."

But their Lordships did not say that an unauthorized alienation was beyond the scope of Article 44, and herein, with all due respect, lies the fallacy of the argument of the learned Chief Justice, the foundation of which was laid in the judgment in Unni v. Kunchi Amma (11) where all alienations, whether by managers of a joint family, Hindu widows or guardians, were placed in the same category. As remarked by Mr. Rustomjee in his Commentary on the Limitation Act at page 250: "Article 44 presupposes that the alienation is unauthorised and if it were held that such alienation does not come within the article, the article would in effect be nullified."

In order to answer the question before us we must confine ourselves strictly to the case of a transfer of property by a Hindu mother acting as natural guardian of her minor son, and not be led away by false analogies. The position of the natural guardian is not the same as that of the Hindu widow, or the manager of a joint family, or an unauthorised guardian. The doctrine of subservience which was applied in Bhagvant Govind v. Kondi (6) was expressly disapproved of by the Privy Council in Malkarjun v. Narhari (13). In that case a mortgagor sought to redeem after the equity of redemption had been sold at a judicial sale in execution of a decree. Their Lordships held that the sale was not a nullity and that the suit was to set aside the sale. They said at page 350: "It is obvious that the expression 'set aside a sale' is not attended by any such difficulty (as the expression 'set aside an adoption'), because a sale, valid until set aside, can be legally and literally set aside; and anybody who desires relief inconsistent with it may and should pray to set it aside." Referring to Bhagvant Govind v. Kondi (6) which had been relied upon in argument, their Lordships said: "In overruling the plea of limitation the Court made the following observations: 'The necessity of impugning the sale of 1863 to the second defendant arises from the second defendant's resisting the plaintiff's suit to redeem the mortgage and is, therefore, subservient to that suit'...Their Lordships find it impossible to grasp the reasoning behind them. If it means that the right to set aside the sale is kept alive as long as the right to redeem would subsist by virtue of the mortgage, the result is that the validity of the sale might be held in suspense for sixty years.... But if the sale is a reality at all, it is a reality defeasible only in the way pointed out by law...The Limitation Act protects bona fide purchasers at judicial sales by providing a short limit of time within which suits may be brought to set them aside. If the protection is to be confined to suits which seek no other relief than a declaration that the sale ought to be set aside, and is to vanish directly some other relief consequential on the annulment of the sale is sought, the protection is exceedingly small. Such, however, seems to be the effect of the doctrine of subservience laid down by the Bombay High Court." The argument that if the plaintiff sues for possession ignoring the transfer, he cannot be said to be suing to set aside a transfer, for the question does not arise until the defence is raised, is also disposed of by this judgment, while reference may be made to Shrinivas v. Hanmant (15) where it was held that Article 118 of Act XV of 1877 applied to every suit where the validity of defendant's adoption is the substantial question in dispute, whether such question is raised by the plaintiff in the first instance or arises in consequence of the defendant setting up his own adoption as a bar to the plaintiff's success.

Lastly there is the argument that a plaintiff need not sue to set aside a transfer to which he is not a party; Sikher Chund v. Dulputty Singh (12). That argument may very well apply to a suit by a reversioner impugning a transfer by a Hindu widow, for the widow represents her husband's estate, and until her death there is no one who has a vested interest, nor is there an obligation on any one to take proceedings until the reversion falls in. But the natural guardian represents the minor's estate and has power to manage it, subject to the condition that he must manage it for the benefit of the minor.

There was one argument addressed to us, which seems to me to have considerable weight, and which I should have been inclined to favour if it had not appeared that it has been concluded by authority.

The use of the word 'ward' in Article 44 of the Limitation Act is peculiar and there seems no reason why the word 'minor' should not have been used. It was argued that 'ward' in Article 44 means a minor to whom a guardian has been appointed by the Court under the Guardians and Wards Act or by Will. 'Ward' is defined in the Guardians and Wards Act as a minor who has a guardian, but the only guardians referred to in the Act are guardians appointed by the Court or by Will, and there is nothing unreasonable in the suggestion that the term 'ward' is confined to a minor who has such a guardian and does not include minors who have natural guardians. That appears to have been the view underlying the remarks of Scott, C. J., already referred to in Anandappa v. Totappa (4). But on reference to the judgment of the Privy Council in Malkarjun v. Narhari (13) at page 351 and Mata Din v. Ahmad Ali (14) it will be seen that their Lordships expressly state that Article 44 applies to transfers by guardians without excluding natural guardians, and as in the one case they were referring to a Hindu mother, and in the other to guardians under Muhammadan Law, it is obvious that they considered that natural guardians under Hindu or Muhammadan Law were not excluded.

It follows that in my opinion Omana could not redeem without suing to set aside the transfer by his mother and as he did not do so within three years of his attaining majority, the plaintiff's suit is barred.

The appeal must be allowed and the plaintiff's suit dismissed with costs throughout.

HEATON, J.—I concur.

SHAH, J.—I agree that the present suit is barred by limitation; and as this conclusion involves a reconsideration of the ratio decidendi in Balappa Dundappa v. Chanbasappa Shivalingappa (2), to which I was a party, I desire to state briefly my reasons for accepting it.

In the present case the property belonged to Nana, who mortgaged it to the defendant's father in 1877. Nana died, leaving a widow Sidubai and a minor son Omana. Sidubai purporting to act as the guardian of Omana sold the equity of redemption to the defendant's father in 1891. Omana died in 1901, leaving a widow Gopika who died in 1908. The plaintiff who is the next heir of Omana, after the death of his widow Gopika, filed the present suit in 1916 to redeem the mortgage of 1877. The defendant relied upon the sale by the mother of Omana. But it has been found by the lower Appellate Court that there was no necessity nor was there any benefit to the estate.

It is urged, however, on behalf of the defendant that the sale was liable to be set aside at the instance of Omana on his attaining majority and that his right to file a suit for that purpose having been barred by Article 44 of the Limitation Act before his death in 1901, the plaintiff's present claim for redemption, which necessarily involved the setting aside of the sale by Omana's mother, was barred. It is urged that he cannot ignore the sale, which is not void but voidable at the instance of the minor son, and that a prayer to set aside the sale is essentially involved in the claim for redemption.

The questions that arise for decision are whether Article 44 applies to a sale by the natural guardian of a Hindu minor, and, secondly, whether, it is necessary to have it set aside before making any claim for possession or redemption on the footing that no such sale exists.

As regards the first point, I am satisfied that the scope of Article 44 is not limited to sales by guardians who are appointed under testaments or by the Court. The language of the article is general and wide enough to include sales by natural guardians, who may have some authority, however limited, to alienate the property of the minor, that is, sales which are not wholly void, but are voidable at the instance of the person interested in the property. This view derives support from the observations of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Malkarjun v. Narhari (13) and Mata Din v. Ahmad Ali (14). Though the article was first introduced in the Limitation Act of 1877, there is no case in which it is held to be restricted to sales by testamentary guardians or guardians appointed by the Court. The mother of a Hindu minor as the natural guardian of her son has authority to alienate the immoveable property of her son under necessity or for the benefit of the estate. It is enough to refer to Hunoomanpersaud Panday v Musammat Babooee Munraj Koonweree (3) on this point. It cannot be said that the sale here was wholly unauthorised as in Mata Din's case (14). I am, therefore, of opinion that the sale, such as we have in this case, was one which the minor on attaining majority could have sued to set aside and Article 44 would have applied to such a suit.

The next question in effect is whether he ought to have sued to set it aside, and if so, what is the effect of his omission to do so within the prescribed period on the present suit. On this point also I am of point that he ought to have sued to set it aside within the period allowed by Article 44 and his omission to do so bars the present suit filed by a person who claims under him. It seems to me that the observations of their Lordships in Malkarjan's case (13) and in Khiaraiamal v. Daim (16) support this view. The sale by the mother in this case was not null and void, but it was voidable at the instance of Omana.

I have reached this conclusion after a consideration of the conflicting authorities on this point, and I am satisfied that the reasoning in Balappa Dundappa v. Chanbasappa Shivalingappa (2) cannot be properly applied to the case of a sale by the natural guardian of a Hindu minor, who has power to sell the property of the minor under certain circumstances.

Section 38 of the Transfer of Property Act, to which a reference is made in the judgment in Balappa's case (2), applies to a sale by any person authorised only under circumstances in their nature variable to dispose of immoveable property. As for instance it may apply to a Hindu widow who has inherited her husband's estate but has a limited power of disposal over the immoveable property, as well as to a Hindu widow as the natural guardian of her minor son, who can alienate the immoveable property of her son under certain circumstances. But it only lays down a substantive rule as to when such transfers would bind the persons affected by them. It is not the purpose of the section [illegible] remedies which persons [illegible] transfers may have to [illegible] rid of the effect of the transfers made by different persons with limited powers of disposal. A reversioner affected by the transfer effected by a Hindu widow who has inherited her husband's property may be able to adopt a particular course. A minor whose property has been alienated by his natural guardian may have to adopt a different course. A reversioner may sue during the lifetime of the widow to have her alienation declared inoperative after her death or may wait until her death. The alienation by her is in no case void: it is good during the widow's lifetime: and after her death it does not require to be set aside under any Article. The reversioner's interest during the widow's lifetime is contingent and not vested in the estate and his suit for possession after the widow's death is governed by Article 141. The case of a Hindu minor affected by the transfer effected by his mother appears to be quite different. The sale can be set aside on his attaining majority and there is a special article which provides the limitation for such a suit. I do not think, therefore, that section 38 of the Transfer of Property Act can afford any reason for treating all cases to which it would apply, on the same basis as to the remedies open to the persons affected by the transfers.

I need not refer to those cases in which the suits were filed by reversioners in respect of the alienations by the widows who had inherited their husband's property.

As regards an alienation by a natural guardian of a Hindu minor, the case of Bhagvant Govind v. Kondi (6) is undoubtedly against the view which we take in this case. But so far as the case relates to the point under consideration, it is distinctly disapproved by the Privy Council in Malkarjun's case (13).

Though the case of Balappa Dundappa v. Chanbasappa Shivalingappa (2) decided by Scott, C. J, and myself may be distinguishable on its special facts as the alienation in that case was by a step-mother, the ratio decidendi in that case and in the case of Anandappa v. Totappa (4) supports the conclusion reached in Bhagvant's case (6), and these two decisions are based upon the view that the necessity for a plaintiff to sue for setting aside a sale depends upon whether the onus of proving circumstances establishing its invalidity lies upon him or whether it lies upon the defendant to prove circumstances establishing its validity. This view was largely based upon observations made in cases relating to suits by reversioners in respect of alienations made by widows inheriting their husbands' estates as such. On a further consideration I am satisfied that the necessity for suing to set aside a sale does not depend so much upon the question whether the onus lies upon the plaintiff or the defendant in the first instance, but upon the question whether the sale is by a person wholly unauthorised or by a person who is authorised only under certain circumstances to alienate the property, or in other words whether the sale is null and void or only voidable if the person interested seeks to avoid it. If the latter is the case, the persons concerned should sue to have it set aside if there is any Article of the Limitation Act applicable to such a suit. In the present case Article 44 applies, and therefore, the necessity of suing to set aside the sale is established under the circumstances.

In two later cases, Laxmava v. Rachayya (1) and Hemidas v. Virupaxappa, Second Appeal No. 1143 of 1917, decided on 1st October 1918 (unreported), the decisions in Balappa Dundappa v. Chanbasappa Shivalingappa (2) and Anandappa v. Totappa (4) have been dissented from. I have reconsidered the point in view of this conflict of decisions and in the light of the arguments urged in this case, and I am satisfied that the view we now take is the correct view.

Speaking for myself, I regret the result for as a matter of fact this view is likely to unsettle some existing titles to immoveable properties The decision in Bhagvant's case (6) was in 1889. In 1900 that part of the decision with which we are concerned was disapproved by the Privy Council. Inspite of that Bhagvant's case (6) has been probably followed on this point in some cases in this Presidency, I mean cases which have not been reported. Then we come to the conflicting decisions to which I have already referred. I cannot say that the course of decisions has been uniform and long enough to invite the application of the doctrine of stare decisis.

I, therefore, concur in the order proposed by my Lord the Chief Justice.

JUDGMENT.

JWALA PRASAD, J.—This is an application for leave to appeal in forma pauperis under Order XLIV. Proviso to rule 1 of that Order requires that the application should be rejected unless on a perusal of the judgment we think that the decree is contrary to law or some usage having the force of a law or otherwise erroneous or unjust.

We have read the judgment and have carefully considered the arguments that have been advanced to us by the learned Vakil on behalf of the applicant. It is conceded that the decree is not contrary to law or some usage having the force of a law. But it is contended that it is erroneous and unjust. The suit of the plaintiff, Benares Bank, Ltd., was based upon a promissory note executed by the applicant, who was defendant in the suit. The Court below has, upon the evidence in the case, come to the conclusion that the note was duly and properly executed by the applicant. That finding has not been challenged before us and in the face of the evidence summarized in the judgment it is impossible to challenge it. It is contended that the note itself was not enforceable in the suit, firstly, on the ground that the payee mentioned in the note is not the plaintiff Benares Bank. The payee is described as follows: "The Manager or Acting Manager, Benares Bank, Ltd." Under section 4 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, the payee mentioned in the note must be a "certain person." The contention is that the payee was not the Bank, but the Manager thereof. Our attention has been invited to the evidence of Mohan Lal, who acted as Manager at the time when the promissory note in question was executed. No doubt he says that he was the payee but obviously he means that he was so as an agent on behalf of the Bank. On the face of the note, he cannot lay any claim for the money payable thereunder in his personal capacity. He was a representative of the Bank and the real payee mentioned in the note is, therefore, the Bank itself. No uncertainty attaches at all as to who the real payee is. In the case of Megginson v. Harper (1) the contention, similar to that put forward before us on behalf of the appellant, was overruled in a case of a hand-note payable to the Manager of the "National Provincial Bank of England" and also in the case of trustees acting under the Will of another in the case of Holmes v. Jaques (2). Certain rulings were placed before us to show that a suit would not lie by the beneficiary where the hand-note is in the name of a benamidar. But this is not a suit by a farzidar or a beneficiary. The agent mentioned in the bond was not the farzidar of the Bank but was the servant of the Bank. Those decisions, therefore, have no application to the present case and we need hardly refer to them any further. This contention on

It is next contended that the promissory note in question was without consideration. This contention is based upon the ground that two of the four hand-notes, which formed the consideration of the promissory note in suit, were executed by Janki Das, brother of the applicant. We do not see anything wrong in the applicant executing a hand note to discharge the liability of his brother. It is not our province to investigate into the reasons for the applicant's having taken upon himself the liability of his brother. There is no substance in this contention as well.

Thirdly, it has been stated that the interest of 24 per cent. per annum charged in the promissory note was illegal inasmuch as the previous hundis, in lieu of which the promissory note was executed, were silent about interest, and that under section 80 of the Negotiable Instruments Act the plaintiff was entitled only to 6 per cent. per annum interest calculated upon the sums mentioned in the hundis. From the judgment it is clear that the defendant agreed to pay interest at the rate of 24 per cent. subsequent to the execution of the hundis, when the time for payment had approached and the plaintiff threatened the defendant to institute a suit. The defendant obtained enlargement of time, and that is a good consideration for the agreement to pay interest. Section 80 is an enabling section and is no bar to the recovery of interest in the circumstances mentioned above. The parties can rely upon the subsequent agreement to pay interest when the hundis are silent. Besides, we cannot enter into those facts and in fact we cannot go behind the promissory note, which admittedly stipulates to pay interest at the rate of 24 per cent. This contention is also overruled.

Fourthly, it has been contended that the suit was bad inasmuch as Janki Das was not impleaded as a party. The promissory note in suit was executed by the defendant and it would have been improper on behalf of the plaintiff to implead any other person in the suit and to complicate the simple issue involved in the suit based upon the promissory note.

Fifthly, it has been contended that the trial of the suit is vitiated in procedure, viz, the failure of the Court below to compel the production of the account books and bahi khatas of the firm and also the examination of the cashier thereof. From the judgment it does not appear that any such grievance was expressed in the Court below, nor any material has been placed before us to show that the defendant made proper application in the Court below for summoning the cashier and for the production of the documents by the Bank.

Lastly, it has been urged that the Court had no jurisdiction to try the suit. There is no substance in this contention. The hand note was executed at Bankipore and was payable at Muzaffarpur. The suit was, therefore, properly tried at Muzaffarpur. From the judgment it does not appear that any of the aforesaid points, except the last one regarding jurisdiction, was raised in the Court below. It is not, therefore, open to the applicant to raise them in this Court. However, as they were urged before us, we have gone through them, and have come to the conclusion that there is no merit in this appeal.

This application for leave to appeal in forma pauperis must, therefore, be rejected.

As notices were issued to the Government Pleader and to the opposite party and they in response thereto appeared and contested this applicatien, they are entitled to costs.

ADAMI, J.,—I agree.

Application rejected.

Hindu Law—Alienation—Widow and daughter joining in gift to sons of another daughter—Gift, validity of—Daughter, right of, to impeach gift—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 6.

BAI PARVATI v. DAYABHAI MANCHHARAM.

A Hindu widow and one of her daughters gifted certain properties to the sons of another daughter, purporting to convey by the widow as the life-tenant and by the daughter as the next reversioner. On the death of the widow, the daughter brought the present suit to recover the property from the donees on the ground that as against her the gift was invalid, as it conveyed her chance of surviving her mother and succeeding to the property as the reversioner:

Held, that the gift was only good as regards the life-interest of the widow, as the Hindu Law does not recognise the transfer of a chance of succeeding to a reversion, and that consequently the gift as regards the daughter was invalid. [p. 267, col. 2; p. 268, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—One Kashidas died in 1868 leaving a widow Gulab, a son Ghelabhai and two daughters Parvati and Jekore. His property descended to his son Ghelabhai. On Ghelabhai's death his mother Gulab became his heir. Gulab died in 1911. In 1891 Gulab and Parvati, one of the daughters, gifted two properties to defendants Nos. 1 to 4, who were the minor sons of the deceased daughter Jekore, purporting to convey those properties by Gulab as the life-tenant and by Parvati as the next reversioner. After the death of Gulab, Parvati filed this suit to recover the property from the donees under the gift of 1891, on the ground that the deed as against her was invalid as it conveyed her chance of surviving Gulab and succeeding, therefore, to the property as reversioner.

The trial Court dismissed the suit, and the appeal against the order of dismissal was also dismissed by the First Class Subordinate Judge. A good deal of confusion often arises in cases of this nature owing to the facts of the case not being properly held in view in arguing the points of law which may arise. There may have been circumstances in the case which would have enabled Gulab and Parvati together to give a good title to a third party of the property in question. It all depended on the manner in which the transaction was effected. But keeping strictly to the facts in this case, at the time of the deed of gift, Gulab was the life-tenant, Parvati had the chance of succeeding to the property on Gulab's death if she happened to survive Gulab. In these circumstances the document of 1891 was executed. Gulab conveys her life-interest, Parvati conveys her chance of succeeding after the death of Gulab. If those interests together made up what may be called a fee in the property donated, then no doubt it would be a good transaction. But it cannot be said, however one looks at the case, that the whole of the fee was conveyed to defendants Nos. 1 to 4 by that document. It is not a case of an alienation by a widow of property of which she is the life-tenant with the consent of the next reversioner. From such consent it can be presumed that the alienation by the widow was for a necessary purpose. The onus would lie upon the person disputing the alienation to show that it was not for necessary purposes. Again, the widow might have relinquished the whole of her life-interest into the hands of the next reversioner, in which case the next reversioner would then become solely entitled to the property. It cannot be said here that Gulab relinquished her interest in the properties gifted to the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 by Parvati before the gift was made. Therefore, we must consider only the facts as they occurred in this case. What the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 got under the deed of gift was the life-interest of Gulab plus the chance of Parvati succeeding to the property on the death of Gulab. These were two distinct interests, and it cannot be contended that under the gift the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 were solely entitled to the whole of the interests in the property. In my opinion the gift was only good as regards the life-interest of Gulab.

It has been urged upon us that the father of defendants Nos. 1 to 4 gave consideration for the gift by maintaining Gulab. Although that does not seem to me to affect the appellant's argument in any way, there can be no hardship, at any rate as regards defendants Nos. 1 to 4, if their father maintained Gulab during the time he was in possession of the property during Gulab's lifetime.

So then the transfer by Parvati in the deed of gift of 1891 of her chance of succeeding to the reversion cannot be sustained. It is certainly bad under section 6 of the Transfer of Property Act, and it would lie upon the respondents to show that section 6 does not apply because by the provisions of Hindu Law such a transfer is recognised as good. But there is no direct authority on the point under Hindu Law, though there are dicta in several cases which have been cited which clearly show that it is the opinion not only of Judges in India, but also of their Lordships of the Privy Council that Hindu Law does not recognise the transfer of spes successionis. Therefore, the repondents have not satisfied us that this transfer by Parvati of her chance of succession is valid. If then it is invalid there is an end of the case, unless it can be argued that Parvati is prevented by some rule of law from setting up the contention that the deed as regards her interest is invalid. I know of no rule of law which can prevent a party from asking the Court to hold that a particular transaction, which, as a matter of fact, is invalid, should be held to be invalid.

There can be no estoppel on a point of law. The fact is that it is the duty of the Court, as soon as the invalidity of a transfer is pointed out, if it is satisfied that there is such an invalidity, to set aside the document. Therefore, in my opinion the deed of gift to defendants Nos. 1 to 4 was good only as regards the life-interest of Gulab, and was bad as regards the transfer of a chance which Parvati had at that time to succeed to the reversion, Therefore, the appeal succeeds and the decree of the lower Appellate Court must be set aside. There must be a decree in favour of the plaintiff for possession of the property with mesne profits from the date of the suit and costs throughout. Under Order XXXIII, rule 10, the plaintiff to pay Court-fees.

Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act (VI B. C. of 1908), ss. 211, 270—Order passed by Deputy Collector under s. 211—Appeal, whether lies—Deputy Commissioner, powers of revision of.

A Deputy Commissioner has no power to hear an appeal from a decision of a Deputy Collector given under section 211 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act [p. 269, col. 1.]

If it can be shown that a Deputy Collector, whilst exercising under section 211 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act the powers of a Deputy Commissioner delegated to him, has failed to exercise a jurisdiction which he might have exercised or has usurped a jurisdiction which it was not within his competency to exercise, then the Deputy Commissioner would have power under section 270 of the Act to order him either to exercise that jurisdiction or to refrain from exercising it, as the case may be. Mr. Rai Thirbuan Nath Sahay, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.

MILLER, C J.—This is an application in revision brought by the landlord of certain property against an order of the Deputy Commissioner of Ranchi, in which he refused to interfere by way of exercising powers of revision over an order of the Deputy Collector made in an application under section 211 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act. It appears that the petitioner who is the landlord of the property in question, obtained a decree for rent against his registered tenant. He thereupon sought to put in execution the decree. The opposite parties, Mangal Nath Tewari and Jagdish Nath Tewari, instituted proceedings before the Deputy Collector under section 211 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act contending that they were the transferees of the tenants who had been sued, the transfer having taken place sometime before the rent action was instituted, and that they alone were entitled to the land and they asked the Deputy Collector to adjudicate upon their claim. The section in question provides in effect that if before the day fixed for the sale of the property in suit, a third party appears and alleges that he and not the person against whom the decree has been obtained was in lawful possession or had some interest in the tenure or holding when the decree was obtained then the Deputy Commissioner shall examine such party according to law, and, if he sees sufficient reason for so doing and if the party deposits in Court or gives security for the amount of the decree, he shall stay the sale and after taking evidence adjudicate on the claim. There is a proviso, however, to the section that no transfer of a tenure (which this was) shall be recognized unless it has been registered in the office of the landlord or sufficient cause for non-registration is shown to the satisfaction of the Deputy Commissioner. Now the Deputy Collector before whom the case originally came considered the evidence put forward by the objectors, the present respondents, and it appears that they filed certain documents showing that they had been sued for rent by the landlord, that is to say by the Manager appointed under the Encumbered Estates Act to manage the property in question, and they also produced a money order receipt for payment of registration-fees. The Deputy Collector considered that in these circumstances the landlord could not contend that they had not registered their names, because he had already recognized them as tenants and had already recognized the transfer.

From that decision the landlord applied to the Deputy Commissioner asking him to exercise his powers of revision, if in fact he had any, over the Deputy Collector and to set aside his order on the ground that he had not properly exercised his jurisdiction under section 211. It is clear that the Deputy Commissioner had no power to hear an appeal from a decision under the section in question from the Deputy Collector. Whether he has any powers of revision or not depends upon the interpretation of section 270 of the Act. That section provides that in the performance of their duties and the exercise of their powers under the Act Deputy Commissioners shall be subject to the general direction and control of the Commissioner and the Board, and Deputy Collectors exercising the functions of the Deputy Commissioner (which was the case here) shall also be subject to the direction and control of the Deputy Commissioner. That section, I think, provides for giving certain powers of control both to the Commissioner and to the Deputy Commissioner over acts performed by subordinates whilst exercising the powers of their superiors, and it is not necessary, in my opinion, to lay down with any exactitude or precision the entire scope of the powers which are intended to be included in that section. I think, however, that if it can be shown that the Deputy Collector, whilst exercising the powers delegated to him of the Deputy Commissioner, has failed to exercise a jurisdiction which he might have exercised or has usurped a jurisdiction which it was not within his competency to exercise then the Deputy Commissioner would have power to order him either to exercise that jurisdiction or to refrain from exercising it, as the case may be. The same of course would apply in the case of the Commissioner and the Board dealing with acts performed by the Deputy Commissioner. In the present case the Deputy Commissioner considered that he had no powers of revision under section 270 and refused to interfere. To that extent I think he was wrong. But whether the present case is one in which he ought to have interfered is another question. Having considered the decision of the Deputy Collector, I think it is clear that what he intended to hold was that the circumstances of the case brought it within the exception to the proviso which I have already mentioned. The proviso is that no transfer of a tenure shall be recognized except in certain cases, and these exceptions are where it has been registered in the office of the landlord or sufficient cause for non-registration is shown to the satisfaction of the Deputy Commissioner. What I think the Deputy Collector intended to hold was, although he does not say so in terms, that the circumstances of this case show that as there had been recognition by the landlord of the tenancy of the objectors, there was sufficient reason shown for not having it registered. There further was the evidence which he had before him of a money order receipt in payment of registration fees, and he may well have thought in these circumstances that that was an additional reason for coming to the conclusion that sufficient cause had been shown for non-registration. It appears, therefore, that there was in fact no failure to exercise jurisdiction, nor was there any attempt to usurp a jurisdiction which he in fact had not. In these circumstances it seems to me the Deputy Commissioner was right in refusing to interfere by way of revision with the order made by his subordinate officer. I think that this application should be dismissed with costs.

DAS, J.—I agree.

KARMALI RAHIMTULLA AND OTHERS —DEFENDANTS.

Succession Act (X of 1865), s. 187—Hindu Wills Act (XXI of 1870)—Applicability of Acts to Will of Khoja Muhammadan—Probate, whether necessary—Will, nature of.

Neither section 187 of the Succession Act nor the Hindu Wills Act is applicable to the Will of a Khoja Muhammadan, and Probate is not essential to the validity of such a Will which stands on no other footing than a deed of gift. [p. 271, col. 1.]

Mr. Pettigara, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Kanga, for the Defendants.

JUDGMENT.—This is a suit for specific performance of an agreement to sell executed on August 19, 1919, by one Bai Mariambai deceased in favour of the plaintiffs. It is only necessary to consider one of the issues originally raised, as the others have been abandoned. The only point on which the parties are now at variance is contained in issue No. 4, viz., whether defendant is bound to take out representation to the estate of Mariambai.

The deceased lady was a Khoja and defendant is her son. He is prima facie her heir as the property was admittedly her stridhan, if indeed that term is strictly applicable. Further there is a document purporting to be the last Will and testament of Mariambai, whereby defendant is sole legatee. The question is whether plaintiffs can call upon him to take out probate of this Will.

Plaintiffs say that there is a granddaughter who might, in certain circumstances, be entitled to succeed if there was an intestacy. Whether those circumstances exist or not they do not know, but upon the existence or non-existence of those circumstances depends the answer to the question whether the property is Yautaka or Ayautaka stridhan. Therefore, their title is not safe unless the Will is admitted to Probate.

The defendant's answer put shortly is twofold. First, that defendant as representative of Mariambai cannot be called upon to make good any title but that of Mariambai. Secondly, that as there is no statutory obligation on him to take out probate, he cannot be compelled to do so, and that plaintiffs ought to be satisfied with proof of the Will which he is willing to offer.

The first objection cannot prevail. Defendant ex hyrothesi represents the estate. He is bound by the agreement to sell, and he is also bound by the condition in the agreement to deduce a marketable title. His position is that he is the legal representative of Mariambai, and he is bound to make that position good. The point is practically covered by section 27 of the Specific Relief Act.

As to the second question it is necessary to decide whether section 187 of the Indian Succession Act is applicable. If so, then the right of the defendant to convey the property cannot be established without probate. The point is covered by authority [Haji Mahomed Mitha v. Musa i Esaji (1)]. If on the other hand section 187 of the Indian Succession Act is not applicable, title under the Will can be established without probate and the Will, therefore, stands on the same footing as any other document of title. Generally speaking, the section is not applicable to the Wills of Muhammadans [Shaik Moosa v. Shaik Essa (2), Sakina Bibee

(1) 15 B. 657; 8 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 443.

(2) 8 B. 241; 8 Ind. Jur. 571; 4 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 534.

v. Mahomed Ishak (3). Nor indeed, as explained in the former of these cases, to any Wills to which the Hindu Wills Act, 1870, is not applicable (see page 254 of the report). The question really narrows itself to this: "Whether the Hindu Wills Act, 1870, is applicable to the Will of a Khoja Muhammadan." The general question whether the Wills of Khojas are governed by Hindu or Muhammadan Law, mooted in Hasanalli v. Popatlal (4), does not arise for the purposes of the present case. Whatever may be the law applicable to Khojas in testamentary matters, it cannot be contended that they are Hindus Therefore, they are not within the scope of the Hindu Wills Act, 1870.

It follows, therefore, that probate not being essential to the validity of the Will, it stands on no other footing than a deed of gift, and if it is on the face of it a valid document, plaintiffs must, in my opinior, be satisfied with proof, such as is offered, showing that it was executed by Mariambai under such circumstances as to make it a valid testamentary instrument. On that proof being recorded, further orders will be passed.

[The rest of the judgment is not essential for the purposes of report.—Ed.]

Where, rather than amend his plaint, a plaintiff requests that his suit be dismissed a subsequent suit by him, including part of the subject-matter of the previous suit, is barred by Order XXIII, rule 1 (3) of the Civil Procedure Code.

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Dera Ghazi Khan, dated the 3rd May 1918.

Mr. Beni Parshad, for the Appellant.
Mr. Jagan Nath, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The Courts below are right in holding that the present suit is barred under Order XXIII, rule 1 (3) of the Civil Procedure Code. On the 2nd January 1918 plaintiff's agent distinctly informed the Court that he had decided not to amend his plaint and asked that the suit should be dismissed. This was done, and no permission to sue again in respect of the whole or part of the subject-matter of that suit was either asked for or granted. Order VII, rule 11, clause (b) of the Code, now relied upon is clearly not in point, as it was not the Court that required plaintiff to correct the valuation of his former claim. It was plaintiff himself who for reasons of his own desired to alter the valuation and for that purpose prayed to be allowed to amend his plaint. The Court granted his request and fixed the 2nd January 1918 as the date for representation of the plaint as amended, and on that date (as already stated) plaintiff's agent informed the Court that he did not intend to amend the plaint and prayed that the suit should be dismissed. Upon the facts as disclosed the Courts had no alternative but to dismiss the second suit (which includes part of the subject-matter of the first suit) as barred by Order XXIII, rule 1 (3). The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Court Fees Act (VII of 1870), ss. 10, 12—Appeal, second—Deficiency in respect of Court-fee in lower Court, how to be recovered—Procedure.

Whenever it is intended to recover a deficit Court-fee from a respondent before the High Court in respect of something due in a lower Court, the proper course is to admit the appeal for hearing and to take action under section 12 read with section 10 of the Court Fees Act. The Court is then in full seisin of the case and can punish the defaulting plaintiff or first appellant, as the case may be, by the dismissal of his suit or appeal. [p. 272, col. 1.]

Where, however, the appeal before the High Court is dismissed under Order XLI, rule 11 of the Civil Procedure Code, no such action can be taken till the order of dismissal is reviewed and the appeal is admitted for hearing. [p. 272, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.—In this case the second appeal was dismissed under Order XLI, rule 11 of the Civil Procedure Code. The respondent before this Court who was the appellant before the Court of first appeal did not pay the full Court-fee payable upon his memorandum of appeal in that Court. If a decree had been made in his favour in second appeal it would have, perhaps on the authority of Narain Singh v. Chaturbhuj Singh (1), been competent to this Court to refrain from signing its decree till the deficit had been paid by the respondent. The inherent powers of the Court would, we think, cover such a procedure; but no decree having been made in the respondent's favour by this Court and no decree having been prepared, it does not seem that it is possible to take any coercive action against the respondent for the purpose of recovering the deficit Court-fee. The proper course, whenever it is intended to recover a deficit from a respondent before this Court in respect of something due in a lower Court, appears to be to admit the appeal for hearing and to take action under section 12 read with section 10 of the Court Fees Act. The Court is then in full seisin of the case and can punish the defaulting plaintiff or first appellant, as the case may be, by the dismissal of his suit or appeal. The learned Judge of the Allahabad High Court in Narain Singh's case (1) did not express any opinion on the point whether the respondent could be coerced in this manner for his laches in the Court below but, in our opinion, section 10 of the Court Fees Act would apply to such a case.

In the cases now before us the appeals having been dismissed under Order XLI, rule 11 of the Civil Procedure Code, we can take no such action till the order of dismissal is reviewed and the appeals admitted for hearing.

Having regard to the smallness of the sums to be recovered, it does not seem necessary for the Court to review its order of its own motion. Let the papers be returned to the Registrar.

Plaintiff entered into a contract with a firm to purchase a certain quantity of cotton at a particular rate and for a particular delivery, and the defendant as surety guaranteed the performance of the contract. Subsequently the plaintiff entered into another contract with the same firm to sell to it the same quantity of cotton at a higher rate and for the same delivery. Before the date of delivery the firm became insolvent and the plaintiff brought the present suit to recover the difference between the rates of the contracts. The defendant pleaded that by reason of the second contract he was discharged from his suretyship:

Held, that the defendant was liable, as each of the contracts was capable of performance on the due date and the second contract did not amount to a rescission of the original contract. [p. 273, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT.—This is a suit to recover from defendant as surety on a guarantee. The facts are simple and are not in dispute save in one minor particular, that is as to the service of notice of demand, which point was ultimately abandoned as being immaterial to the result. Those facts are shortly as follows. On May 30th, 1917, plaintiffs agreed to buy 100 bales of cotton, April 1918 delivery, at Rs. 406-12 0 from the firm of Balmukund Premsukh. Defendant as surety guaranteed the performance of the contract. On February 3rd, 1918, plaintiffs, being uneasy as to the financial soundness of Balmukund Premsukh, agreed to sell to them 100 bales of the same goods for the same delivery at Rs. 617 8 0. On February 4th Balmukund Premsukh became insolvent. Plaintiffs' claim against them has been paid in part by the Official Assignee. In the present suit they seek to recover the balance from defendant. It is admitted that the market rate on the Vaida day was

Rs. 712. Plaintiffs put their case alternatively. They say, "Either we are entitled to recover the difference between the rates of the two contracts, or the difference between the rate of the first contract and the rate on the Vaida day."

A number of defences were suggested in the written statement, but these were dropped at the hearing. The defence taken is that defendant is discharged from his suretyship by reason of the second contract between the plaintiffs and the principal debtor:

The following issues were raised:—

(1) Whether plaintiffs are entitled to recover Rs. 10,507-8 0 from the defendant?

(2) Whether the first contract remained outstanding until the due date as alleged in paragraph 7 of the plaint?

(3) Whether plaintiffs in the alternative are entitled to claim Rs. 15,262-8 0 or any other sum from the defendants?

(4) Whether defendant is not discharged from his suretyship as set out in paragraph 4 of the written statement?

The result of elaborate arguments in this case has been to confirm the conviction with which I set out that the only question to be decided is whether both the contracts remained alive and capable of performance until the due date. The matter may readily be put from either point of view. On the one hand it may be said that there are two separate and independent contracts, one of sale, and one of purchase, each legally subsisting until the due date, and legally capable of being enforced. On the other hand it may be argued that taking the two contracts together, the intention of the parties was to enter into a new agreement to pay the difference at the due date. From the first point of view the surety is not discharged; from the second point of view the surety is discharged.

So far as I am aware, there is no authority upon this point. As between the parties themselves it could not in practice arise, for whatever their exact legal rights may be, it is plain that they do not intend that there shall be any delivery, but that the sum settled by what may for convenience be termed the "cross-contracts" shall be paid by one to the other. That is no doubt the point of view of the business man, and it is ordinarily permissible to speak of such contracts as "cancelling each other." An instance of the use of this phrase will be found in J. H. Tod v. Lakhmidas Purshotamdas (1). Farran, J, speaking of such contracts says:

"This mode of dealing, when the sale and purchase were to and from the same person, of course had the effect of cancelling the contracts, leaving only differences to be paid."

The learned Judge was in that case dealing with a defence of wager, and the question of the intention to deliver was, therefore, all important. The point here is different, viz., whether the contracts mutually extinguish one another. The case of Sassoon v. Tokersey (2) has also been cited, but there is little in that case which assists the decision here. The most relevant part of the judgment is that which points out the possible difference between the legal point of view and the "business" point of view (see page 624). That difference must be remembered, and it is for this reason that in the present case the subsequent conduct of the parties is of little importance. All that they had to consider was the practical result, which undoubtedly was that differences only would be paid. The extracts from the accounts which have been put in show no more than that as business men they regarded the transactions as settled, and that all that remained to be done was to pay or receive the difference on the due date. This, however, is not conclusive. There is a distinction between the legal "rights created by the contracts and the mode in which those rights may subsequently have been dealt with" (see the case last cited at page 625).

We have here two contracts. On the face of them they are wholly independent. Each continues in full force and effect until it is discharged. Can it be said that the second contract extinguished the first and in so doing was itself extinguished? It seems to me that the true view is rather that each was capable of performance on the due date. Each party had a right to demand delivery from the other, but as the quantities are equal, the practical result must have been that there would be no delivery. This was a necessary consequence of the two contracts. It was their combined effect, but there was no novation in the sense in which the term is used in section 62 of the Indian Contract Act.

Ordinarily no doubt the best guide to the meaning of a contract is the common intention of the contracting parties: but that intention can be gathered only from that which is expressed. Here there are two distinct contracts of different dates. Each is complete in itself and free from ambiguity or obscurity. It is not even suggested that the parties by any outward expression agreed to treat them as forming by their combined effect a third contract superseding both. Therefore, in law no evidence can be admitted varying the terms of either of these contracts. There is "no distinct subsequent oral agreement" rescinding the first contract [cf. section 92 of the Indian Evidence Act, Proviso (4)]. No one even alleges that there are any materials but the contracts themselves and the subsequent conduct of the parties from which the legal position can be gathered. The subsequent conduct does no more than recognise the practical result. But prima facie persons who enter into contracts must be supposed to contemplate performance. The payment of differences is no more than the necessary result of any attempt to insist on the performance of both contracts. If the procedure of tendering the price against the goods and the goods against the price were solemnly enacted, the result clearly would be that the advantage of the one party over the other would be measured precisely by the difference between the contract rates. It is, therefore, in my opinion, unsound to argue that because the parties had in mind the payment of differences only, the two contracts were extinguished. The truth is that the practical mind immediately perceives the practical result of the operation of the two contracts, and confines its attention to that.

Unless it can be held that there was a rescission by a new agreement, how were these contracts discharged? It is a case of a new agreement or nothing. The contracts are in precisely the same form: each is complete in itself and each is on the face of it capable of being enforced on the due date. It has been questioned whether a suit would lie on the earlier contract. This is merely putting the question in another form. To a suit on either of these contracts two answers could be made: first, that the contract was extinguished. Secondly, that the claim due under the other contract should be set off. The latter represents, in my opinion, the true position. The practical result would, of course be that differences only could be awarded.

I have already indicated that upon the view which I have taken, the surety is not discharged. The relevant sections of the Indian Contract Act are sections 133 and 134. The former does not operate here, the reason being that there is no variance in the terms of the first contract. As to section 134 the principal debtor is not released, nor is the legal consequence of the act of the creditor that the principal debtor is discharged. The decisions cited do not carry the matter beyond the words of the Statute which require no comment.

The result, therefore, at which I have arrived—not, I admit, without considerable doubt—is that defendant remains liable on his guarantee. The logical consequence would be that he is liable to pay the plaintiff damages calculated on the difference between the rate of the contract and the rate on the due date. But as the plaintiff asks for a decree for the lesser sum only, viz., the difference between the rates of the two contracts, there will be a decree for that sum only.

I record the following findings:

1. In the affirmative. 2. In the affirmative. In the negative. 4. In the negative.

Decree for plaintiff for Rs. 8,078, costs and interest on judgment at 6 per cent.

In a suit for partition of the whole family property the plaintiff is not bound to file with the plaint such a complete and exhaustive list of all the property as not to exclude any item however small. If a defendant raises the plea that some part of the joint family property has been excluded, it is for him to specify such properties and show that they belong to the family and have been wrongly excluded. Where such an objection is taken, and the plaintiff expresses his willingness to include the properties which, it is suggested, also form part of the joint family property, the suit should not be dismissed on the technical ground that, when it was first brought, these items had not been included in the plaint. It is the duty of the Court to see that justice is done, and an application for amendment, even if made at a late stage, should be allowed. [p. 275, col. 1; p. 276, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff arising out of a suit for partition of joint family property. The suit has been dismissed on the technical ground that the plaintiff failed to include in his claim certain items of joint family property. The other points raised in the suit have not been decided by the learned Subordinate Judge. The plaintiff has come up in appeal. It is a great pity that although the parties had adduced all the evidence which they wanted to produce before the Court, the learned Subordinate Judge, instead of taking the trouble to decide the real points in controversy between the parties, has tried to find a short cut for the disposal of the suit. The suit was not one for partition of only a part of family property but it was professedly a suit for partition of the whole family property, and in paragraph 9 of the plaint it was stated that several times the plaintiff had asked the defendants to divide the whole property of the joint family, but they put the matter off from day to day on various pretexts. It appears that the value of the joint family property is about two lakhs of rupees, whereas the property said to have been excluded is of comparatively small value. Separate written statements were filed by Lala Gopal Das, the plaintiff's father, and by defendants Nos. 1 and 2, and by defendants Nos. 4, 5 and 6. In the written statement filed by defendants Nos. 1 and 2 and that filed by defendants Nos. 4, 5 and 6 no such plea which seems to have found favour with the Court below was raised. The plaintiff's father, Lala Gopal Das, however, pleaded that during the lifetime of Baldeo Das, the common ancestor, the ornaments and other moveable properties had already been divided; and he went on to add in a separate paragraph that certain ornaments and a shop which were in the plaintiff's possession had not been disclosed by him. As the written statement is worded, strictly speaking, there is no plea raised, even by Lala Gopal Das, that there are some items of joint family property which had been excluded from the list of the properties sought to be partitioned. The plaintiff went into the witness-box and he stated that the ornaments referred to in that written statement belonged to his wife and were not joint family property, and he also stated on oath that the stock-in-trade of the tailoring shop was his own property and did not belong to the family. No evidence was adduced to contradict the statement of the plaintiff. The plaintiff's father went into the witness-box, and in his statement also it does not appear that his case was that any part of the joint family property had been excluded from the list of the properties sought to be partitioned. In our opinion in a suit for partition of the whole family property the plaintiff is not bound to file with the plaint such a complete and exhaustive list of all the properties as not to exclude any items howsoever small. If any defendant wishes to raise the plea that any part of the joint family property has been excluded, it is for him to specify such properties and show that they belong to the family and have been wrongly excluded. Before the suit was disposed of, the plaintiff, on the 7th of May 1917, put in an application before the Court to the effect that he was willing that the ornaments and the shop referred to in the written statement of Lala Gopal Das should be included in the claim. This application was ordered to be filed by the Court. In our opinion, in view of the offer made by the plaintiff to include the properties which, it had been suggested, also formed part of the joint family property, the suit should not have been dismissed on the technical ground that, when it was originally brought, these items had not been included in the plaint. The only inference that under the circumstances we can draw is that the Court below shirked its duty and tried to get rid of the case in as short a way as possible. The result of the dismissal would be that the plaintiff will have to bring a second suit for partition and the parties will be put to further embarrassment and trouble. It is the duty of the Court to see that justice is done, and even if an application for amendment had been made at a late stage, we are of opinion that such an application should have been allowed, inasmuch as the plaintiff had offered to put into hotchpot the ornaments and the tailoring shop. In our opinion there was really no defect, either in form or procedure, in the suit; but even if there had been any, we are of opinion that he should have been allowed to amend the plaint and include these items of property. As soon as the application was made by the plaintiff, all defects in the case had disappeared and we fail to see why the learned Subordinate Judge thought fit to dismiss the suit on an admittedly technical ground, namely, that the plaintiff did not include the whole of the joint family property. The defendants Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5 and 6 had not raised this technical plea in their written statements. On the other hand, the pleas which they had raised have not been disposed of by the Court below. We are of opinion that these defendants are entitled to their costs from the plaintiff who also is to some extent to blame, and from the defendant, Lala Gopal Das, the father of the plaintiff. We accordingly allow this appeal, set aside the judgment and the decree of the Court below and remand this case for disposal according to law. The defendants other than Lala Gopal Das will get their costs in both Courts from the plaintiff and Lala Gopal Das. The plaintiff and Lala Gopal Das shall bear their own costs.

An executing Court must execute a decree as it is, and an amendment thereof must be resorted to in separate proceedings either by way of appeal or by way of amendment of the decree, as the case may be, but in construing a decree the executing Court is competent to take the assistance of the pleadings and the judgment for that purpose.[p. 277, col. 2.]

Appeal from a decision of the District Judge of Gaya.

JUDGMENT.

JWALA PRASAD, J.—The only contention raised in this appeal is that the Courts below were wrong in holding that the description of the property given in the execution petition and the sale proclamation was not in accordance with the description given in the mortgage decree as amended by the High Court.

The High Court held that the mortgagor had 18 dams in Touzi No. 206, out of which 12 dams odd share, which he had purchased from one Dubri Lall, was the subject of the mortgage of 1889 in favour of the decree-holder. The description of the property given in the mortgage bond was 13 dams odd share situate in Mouza Fatehpur bearing Touzi No. 2301. In the plaint of the mortgage suit this description was varied by stating that the said village by Collectorate partition came to bear Touzi No. 4183. The Touzi Nos. 2301 and 4183 mentioned in the plaint were both wrong, inasmuch as previous to the execution of the mortgage bond the village was the subject of the Collectorate partition whereby a separate Touzi Number was allotted for the takhta of the 18 dams belonging to the judgment debtor. This mistake was discovered after the decree under the mortgage bond was obtained. An application for correction of the mistake in the decree was made by the decree-holder. The amendment was allowed by the Subordinate Judge, but was disallowed by the District Judge in appeal. This Court, however, restored the order of the Subordinate Judge and set aside that of the District Judge. The result was that the decree was amended and both the Touzi Nos. 2301 and 4183 were expunged and in lieu thereof No. 4206 as the correct Touzi Number of the property was put down. The amended decree runs as follows:

"13 dams 6 kowries and odd share situate in Mouza Fatehpur Harchandan Paryag, Pergana Pachrukhi, Zilla Gaya, the Touzi number of which at the time of the execution of the bond was 4206 with a Jamma Saddar of Rs. 11-5 and which now according to Collectorate partition bears the Touzi No. 4206 with a Jamma Sadar of Rs. 11-5."

In the bond, 13 annas 6 kowries out of 16 annas of the Mouza, of which Touzi number was 2301, are mortgaged. In the amended decree it is not stated what that 13 annas 6 kowries of the 16 annas of the old Touzi would amount to in the 18 dams patti bearing the new Touzi No. 4206. From the judgment of this Court on the basis of which the amended decree was prepared, this 13 annas 6 kowries was out of 18 dams which represent the entire 16 annas of Touzi No. 4206, that is, it will come to 11 annas odd out of the entire new Touzi No. 4206. The amended decree, in so far as it did not clearly work out the exact share of the mortgaged property in the new Touzi No. 4226, was vague.

In the present execution the decree-holder has made it clear in the specification of the property given in the sale proclamation. The figures given therein appear to be correct and represent the proper working out of the order in the decree of this Court. The description of the properties in the execution proceedings, sale proclamation, etc., appears to be correct. Mr. Lakshmi Narain on behalf of the appellant judgment-debtor objects to it on the ground that an executing Court has no right to go behind the decree and in any way to add or amend the terms thereof. We do not dispute this principle which is well settled and has been recoginized by authorities; Udwant Singh v. Tokhan Singh (1), Devendra Prasad v Ram Chunder Prasad (2), Madan Mohan Nath Sahi Deo v. Bhikar Shahu (3). The executing Court has to execute the decree as it is, and any amendment thereof has to be resorted to by separate proceeding either by appeal or by an amendment of the decree, as the case may be. But in the present case the description given in the execution proceedings does not appear to in any way vary or add to the terms of the decree. It simply gives a fuller and more complete description than the decree of the High Court itself contains, and would be the correct description on proper construction of the decree read with the judgment. The question was only of construction of the decree, and not of amendment by varying the terms thereof, adding to it, or correcting any clerical or arithmetical mistake. In construing the decree the executing Court was certainly competent to take the assistance of the pleadings and the judgment for that purpose. This was done in the case of Chunder Mohun Thakoor v. Amrito Chunder Thakoor (4), where the decree was held to have been drawn up in a most slovenly manner causing great deal of trouble and litigation between the parties. The schedules of the properties given in the decree were vague and the orders regarding the costs and damages in the body of the decree were also not free from ambiguity. Portions of the judgment were, therefore, referred to in order to give the decree a reasonable construction and to execute it. Applying this principle to the present case, we find that the decree which was vague and indefinite in terms, and not properly prepared in accordance with the orders of the Court, was capable of being construed in the light of the judgment. This is all that the decree-holder has done in this case. The Courts below were, therefore, right in disallowing the objection of the judgment-debtor. It is then said that the words "Kham and Pukhta" in the sale proclamation do not appear in the High Court judgment, or in the judgment of the Subordinate Judge, or the amended decree. This is true. But these words simply describe the share before and after the partition. It has not been shown to us how these words, in any way, prejudice the description of the property. The description of the property in the present execution proceedings is, therefore, correct. The execution of the decree and the sale of the properties must, therefore, be upheld. The contention of the judgment-debtor is overruled.

The decree-holder should have seen that the property was properly described in the decree prepared in accordance with the order of this Court. He did not even inform the Court that the share of .13 dams odd would work up to 11 annas in the new Touzi No. 4206. He has superfluously added in the present execution proceedings the words "Kham and Pukhta" not found in the judgment or the amended decree. In the circumstances we do not think that he is entitled to costs of this appeal.

The appeal is accordingly dismissed without costs.

ADAMI, J.—I agree.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal is connected with First Appeal No. 318 of 1917 which we have just decided. In the present appeal Shiam Lal, the original mortgagor, is the appellant befor us. The plea taken on his behalf is that the suit for the mortgage having failed, a suit for a simple money decree is barred by time. The first bond is dated the 9th of September 1905 and under the conditions entered therein, the money was payable at the end of five years. There were further conditions in respect to interest. In the case of the second bond of the 2nd of August 1906, the money was payable at the end of four years, and there are similar conditions in respect to payment of interest as in the first bond. It is urged that Article 80, read whith Article 116 of Schedule I of the Limitation Act, applies and, therefore, the suit ought to have been brought on or before the 9th of September 1913. Our attention has been called to certain rulings, but not of this Court. The learned Vakil for the appellant has to admit that there are two rulings of this Court which are against him. In one of these he himself successfully prosecuted the appeal. We refer to the case of Gaya Prasad v. Sher Ali (1) and the case of Makrand Singh v. Kallu Singh (2). He has to admit that if we follow these decisions, then his appeal must fail. Whether these decisions are right or wrong, we can see no rsason whatsoever in the present case at any rate for expressing any opinion to the contrary. One of us was a party to one of these decisions and until these decisions are set aside by a larger Bench, we can see no reason why we should not follow them. In the face of these decisions this appeal must fail and we, therefore, dismiss it with costs including fees on the higher scale.

Under the Hanafi School of Muhammadan Law neighbours have an equal right to pre-empt. In a competition, therefore, between two neighbours, each is entitled to an equal share of the property which forms the subject of pre-emption. [p. 280, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Surat, in Appeal No. 802 of 1916, reversing the decree passed by the Subordinate Judge at Bulsar, in Civil Suit No. 91 of 19 5.

The appeal first came before Macleod, C. J., and Heaton, J.

JUDGMENT OF THE DIVISION BENCH.

The plaintiff sued to obtain a deed of conveyance of the plaint house from the 2nd defendant by right of pre-emption. The parties are all members of one family, a pedigree of which is set out at page 13. The 1st defendant was the owner of houses Z and Y, the 2nd defendant was the owner of house X and the plaintiff bought house W from Thakoredas, the 1st cousion of the 1st and 2nd defendants. Then the 1st defendant bought house X from the 2nd defendant. The plaintiff claimed that he had a right to obtain a deed of conveyance of this house by pre emption. The parties come from Bulsar, and I think it is too late now to dispute the ruling in Gordhandas Girdharbhai v. Prankor (1), in which it was held that by local custom the Hindus of Gujarat have adopted the Muhammadan Law of pre emption, except that that case was considered in a case which came from Kaira, viz., Dahyabhai Motiram v. Chunilal Kishoredas (2), and Mr. Justice Beaman and myself declined to extend its decision beyond the limits of Surat and Broach. It is admitted then that if the Hindu inhabitants of Bulsar can be said to have adopted the Muhammadan Law of pre-emption, the plaintiff in this case has a right to pre-empt. But supposing the 2nd defendant had sold his house to a stranger, then the 1st defendant would also have a right to pre-empt. The plaintiff's case is based on the assumption that if defendant No. 2 sold his house to defendant No. 1 and not to a stranger, he, the plaintiff, alone had a right to pre-empt. Therefore, he claimed the whole house. Against that the 1st defendant claimed that he certainly had a right to pre-empt which was equal to that of the plaintiff, but that as he bought the house, the plaintiff's right to pre-empt was excluded.

The trial Court dismissed the suit on the ground that the plaintiff had not satisfactorily proved that he had performed the proper ceremonies without undue delay. This decision was reversed in appeal, and the learned District Judge directed that the 1st defendant should pass a sale-deed to the plaintiff of half the house X on payment of Rs. 912 8 0. The learned Judge referred to two conflicting rulings on the point whether the plaintiff was entitled to pre-empt in the circumstances of this case. We have considered those rulings, viz., Lalla Nowbut Lall v. Lalla Jewan Lall (3), which supports the appellant, and the other, Amir Hasan v. Rahim Bakhsh (4), which is in favour of the respondents, and it seems to me from the latter decision, which considers all the texts on the point, certainly that the great preponderance of textual authority is in favour of the respondents. We, therefore, think that the judgment of the learned District Judge was right and the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs. The cross-objections are dismissed with costs.

MACLEOD, C. J.—(3rd December 1919.)—Since this case was argued, and before the judgment was signed, we have been referred to the case of Gokaldas v. Partab (5), in which this Court has taken a different view to that which we have expressed. We think, therefore, the best course would be to have the case re-argued before a Bench of three Judges.

Mr. Mirza, (with him Mr. G. N. Thakor), for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT OF THE FULL BENCH.

MACLEOD C. J.—In this case there were four houses in one courtyard, and of these two belonged to the 1st defendant in the suit, and one to the plaintiff. The 4th house was sold by the 2nd defendant in the suit to the 1st defendant, and thereupon the plaintiff filed this suit to obtain a deed of conveyance of the suit house from the 2nd defendant by right of pre-emption. The suit was dismissed in the first Court on the ground that the plaintiff had not established that he had proved that he had performed the necessary ceremonies without undue delay. In first appeal the decree was reversed. The learned Judge held that the plaintiff was entitled to get half the property from the 1st defendant. When the case was argued before us on second appeal, we were prepared to accept the decision of the first Appellate Court, following the decision in Amir Hasan v. Rahim Bakhsh (4). But before the judgment was signed, we were referred to the case of Gokaldas v. Partab (5) where the opposite view had been taken, and it was, therefore, necessary that the case should be argued before a Full Bench. We see no reason why the decision which we had come to on the first occasion should not be confirmed. In Gokaldas v. Partab (5) the learned Judges considered the conflict between the case of Lalla Nowbut Lall v. Lalla Jewan Lall (3) and Amir Hasan v. Rahim Bakhsh (4) and they considered that it was safer to follow the ruling which commended itself to the Calcutta Full Bench. Although they mention that the authorities showed that in this Presidency it has not been the custom to enforce the doctrine of pre-emption to the extent allowed in Allahabad, no cases were referred to. The decision of the learned Judges seems to proceed on the basis that it would cause serious practical inconvenience, and in many cases even injustice, if the right of pre-emption were to be exercised in fractions. Now it is admitted that the parties in this case come from the District of Bulsar where the Hanafi School of Muhammadan Law prevails, and it must further be admitted that according to Hanafi Law neighbours have equal right to pre-empt. It must follow from that, that the plaintiff in this case must succeed unless we are prepared to decide the case, not according to Hanafi Law, but according to some other principle. It has been suggested that we must only apply Muhammadan Law where it is in accordance with the principles of justice, equity and good conscience. Admitting that, for myself I see nothing which is contrary to the principles of justice, equity and good conscience in allowing two neighbours who have equal rights of pre-emption to exercise them.

If A and B are neighbours with equal rights to pre-empt in the case of the sale of a neighbouring house, I do not see why, if B happens to be the first purchaser, A should be deprived entirely of his right to pre-empt. In fact, the only ground on which we can decide not to follow the principle of the Hanafi Law would be on the ground of inconvenience. It may be said that it is not desirable that property should be held in fractions. That may be so on general principles, but certainly in this country it is a most common occurrence. But apart from that I should not myself say that mere inconvenience, resulting from the application of the Hanafi Law, is a reason why we should not apply it. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal must be dismissed with costs. The cross objections are dismissed with costs.

HEATON, J.—I agree that the appeal should be dismissed with costs. We have here the simplest possible case of competitors claiming pre-emption. The original owner of the house, defendant No. 2, sold it to defendant No. 1. The defendant No. 1 and the plaintiff are the only competitors for pre-emption, and it is found that under the law they are equally entitled to pre empt. A very natural, and on the whole a very just decision in a competition of this kind is that each should take half. Their claims are equal in the eye of the law. Therefore, says the law, let them be equally treated, and that is a sufficient and a satisfactory disposal of this case, because defendant No. 2, the vendor, apparently has nothing to say against it and defendant No. 1, the original purchaser, is apparently prepared to take half rather than get nothing. If he had said, "Oh! very well if I can only buy half the property I won't buy any at all, I cancel my purchase," then the affairs would have to be differently viewed, I do not wish to express any opinion as to what in that event my decision would be.

KAJIR, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

In a suit for accounts the parties effected a compromise, one of the terms of which was that the defendant would submit to the Court all account books, deeds and other documents in his possession relating to the property in dispute, in order that they might be made over to the plaintiff, and a decree was passed by consent of the parties in terms of the compromise. The plaintiff applied for execution of this decree so far as it related to the delivery of the documents, and an order was made directing delivery of certain books of account which had not been produced by the defendant. The matter came before the High Court in appeal, and that Court directed, inter alia, that, if the Court was unable from the books already produced to make a satisfactory examination of the accounts, it should call on the defendant to produce the books in question, and on his refusal or failure to do so, should pass a final decree on the materials produced by the plaintiff. On the application of the plaintiff two Commissioners were appointed to examine the accounts. They proceeded to take evidence, and referred to the Court the question whether the books in question should be produced at that stage. The Court made an order for their production, but as they were not produced, the Court, perporting to act under section 32 of the Civil Procedure Code, imposed a fine on the defendant and ordered him to produce the books by a certain date. The fine was paid, and the defendant filed an affidavit to the effect that he could not find the books or get any clue to their whereabouts, and eventually denied that he had got the books. The Court thereupon, acting under section 32 (b) of the Code, ordered the attachment and sale of a village belonging to him. The High Court set aside that order on the ground that section 32 did not apply and directed the Court to carry out the previous order of the High Court. The Commissioners proceeded to take evidence and applied to the Court for instructions as to whether they were to record evidence for the defendant, and whether they were to allow him to cross-examine the plaintiff's witnesses. The Court, without stating under what rule of practice or procedure it purported to act, passed an order that there should be no cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses. Against this order the defendant came to the High Court in the present appeal:

Held, that the only provision of law under which an order of the nature of the order complained of could be justified was Order XI, rule 21, of the Civil Procedure Code, but that rule did not apply to the circumstances of the present case, as no order for discovery or inspection of documents had been made therein within the meaning of that rule, and that as there was no rule of practice to justify a Court to deny absolutely to a party the right to cross-examine, the Court acted without jurisdiction and with material irregularity in passing the order. [p. 286, col. 2.]

Held, further, that although the order impeached was not open to appeal, and although the High Court will not interfere, under section 115 of the Civil Procedure Code, with an interlocutory order unless irreparable injury would be caused to one of the litigants, yet it will interfere with such an order if, as in this case, protracted and costly proceedings, which in the end would be set aside, must result. [p. 287, cols. 1 & 2.]

Obiter:—The penalty imposed by rule 21, Order XI, of the Civil Procedure Code, is of a highly penal nature, and ought only to be used in extreme cases and as a last resort, and should in no case be imposed unless there is a clear failure to comply with the obligation laid down in the rule. When a party who is required to produce documents for inspection definitely swears an affidavit that the documents required are not in his possession or power, the Court should regard this as final and conclusive. [p. 285, col 1.]

Appeal from an order of the Deputy Collector, Hazaribagh, exercising the powers of the Deputy Commissioner, dated the 12th March 1919.

Mr. P. K. Sen (with him Messrs. N. B. Dutt and Shiva Nandan Rai), for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

MILLER, C. J.—This is an appeal from an order of the Deputy Collector of Hazaribagh, directing that there should be no cross-examination by the appellant of the respondent's witnesses in certain proceedings which had been referred to two Commissioners appointed by the Court for the purpose of taking an account between the parties. The respondent, Rani Rikhnath Koeri, is the widow of the appellant's elder brother, Raja Ram Narain, who succeeded to the estate of his father, in the year 1898. At that time the respondent was beneficially interested in certain khorposh grants made by her late father in law, and shortly after her husband succeeded to the estate the management of the khorposh grants was entrusted to the appellant on behalf of the respondent. Subsequently a further similar grant was made in favour of the respondent by her husband and the management of this was also entrusted to the appellant. In 1912 the respondent's husband died and in the following year ill-feeling arose between his widow, the respondent, and her brother-in law, the appellant, with the result that she dismissed him from the family house and he went to live elsewhere, and in November 1914 the Rani instituted the present suit against the appellant, claiming an account from him of his dealings with the khorposh properties during the period of his management. The suit was subsequently compromised upon the terms that the appellant should pay to the respondent Rs. 30,000 in cash and Rs. 30,000 by equal yearly instalments over a period of 6 years. In addition the appellant undertook to pay the respondent such sums as either appeared to her account in certain specified account books or which should be proved to have been received by the appellant for her account and which had not been already entered in the roka bahis, as well as any sum shown in the roka bahis as spent on the respondent's behalf which should be proved not to have been so spent. The appellant also undertook to submit to the Court all account books, deeds and other documents in his possession relating to the property in question in order that they might be made over to the respondent. On the 3rd May 1915 a decree was passed by consent of the parties in the terms of the above compromise, and on the 6th September 1915 an application for execution of the decree so far as it related to the delivery of the documents was filed. The proceedings were instituted under the provisions of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act and were heard by the Deputy Collector of Hazaribagh. On the hearing of that application the Deputy Collector made an order, dated the 5th April 1916, directing delivery of certain books of account which had not been produced by the appellant. The main dispute between the parties related to the production of the amanati bahi or suspense account and the dast garda nagdi bahi or cash loan account. The appellant's case with regard to these books was that he could not find them and that they were not in his possession and had apparently been lost or stolen when he left the family house and went to live elsewhere. The Deputy Collector was apparently not satisfied that sufficient search for them had been made and ordered their delivery accordingly. A further application made by the respondent in the same proceedings for payment of the sums received by the appellant but not credited in the roka bahi or daily account book and the sums debited in the roka but not spent was rejected as not being included in the execution petition.

From this order both parties appealed to the High Court. In so far as the matters are material to the present appeal the High Court by its decision, dated the 12th February 1917, came to the conclusion that the two account books abovementioned were necessary and material for the purposes of the investigation and considered that the onus was upon the appellant to show what had become of the books and to show what steps he had taken to obtain them from his servants and agents in whose custody they had at some time been. The Court further thought that the evidence which had been taken before the Deputy Collector, when he made his order of the 5th April 1916 disclosed a lack of care on the appellant's part and that the lower Court was right in coming to the conclusion that no serious efforts had been made to trace the whereabouts of the books. The Court further ordered the lower Court to proceed to take an account of the sums received by the appellant and not credited in the roka bahi and of the sums therein debited but not actually spent, and directed that if the Court was unable, from the books already produced and in the possession of the respondent, to make a satisfactory examination of the accounts, it should call upon the appellant to produce within a reasonable time the suspense account books and the cash loan account, and that if the appellant should decline or fail to produce them, the Court should proceed to pass a final decree on the materials produced by the respondent.

The respondent then applied to the Deputy Collector to appoint Commissioners to examine the accounts and on the 29th June 1917 two Commissioners were appointed for this purpose. The Commissioners proceeded to take evidence and on the 13th July 1917 referred to the Deputy Collector the question whether the account books in question should be produced at that stage. The Deputy Collector after hearing the Pleaders on both sides considered that the production of these books was then necessary for a satisfactory examination of the accounts and ordered their production. On the 24th July 1917, the books not having been produced, the Deputy Collector, purporting to act under section 32 of the Civil Procedure Code, imposed a fine of Rs. 500 on the appellant and ordered him to produce the books in question by the 31st July. The fine was paid and on the 31st July the appellant filed a petition stating that he had made a thorough search in his office with his manager, Mr. Downing, but could not find the books or get any trace of them. He also filed affidavits sworn by himself and Mr. Downing, stating that they had made a joint and thorough search with the help of their amlas amongst the books of account and other papers in his possession and that they could not find the books required or get any clue to their whereabouts; that they firmly believed that the books had been lost and that it was physically impossible to produce them. The appellant by his petition prayed that further proceedings in this direction should be stopped and that a final decree should be passed on the materials on the record and upon such further evidence as might be adduced by the parties. The respondent at the same time petitioned the Court to enforce the production of the books by the attachment and sale of four villages belonging to the appellant. Before taking further action the Court adjourned the matter for further information as to the net annual income of the villages, appointing the 7th August 1917 for further hearing. On the 7th August the Court again adjourned the case until the 16th to give the appellant another opportunity of producing the books. On the 16th August the appellant filed a petition denying that he had got the books. In spite of this the Deputy Collector, purporting to act under section 32 (b) of the Civil Procedure Code, ordered the attachment and sale of a village belonging to the appellant valued at approximately Rs. 20,000.

This order was subsequently set aside by the High Court upon the application of the appellant on the 25th November 1918, on the ground that the section had no application to the circumstances in question as it applied only to the case of a person who had failed to comply with a summons to attend Court. The High Court at the same time pointed out that the correct procedure in the case of a failure to comply with an order to produce documents was contained in Order XI of the First Schedule of the Civil Procedure Code and directed the Deputy Collector to proceed to carry out the orders contained in the judgment of the High Court dated the 12th February 1917, that is to say, to pass a final decree upon the materials produced by the respondent.

It would appear from what I have already stated that the Deputy Collector appears to have signally failed throughout to take pains to acquaint himself with the procedure applicable to the situation which was presented before him. In the meantime examination of witnesses had proceeded before the Commissioners appointed to take the account. On the 26th November 1917 it appears that the respondent filed a petition praying the Court to issue a warrant of arrest against the appellant for non-production of the account books. The High Court had not at that time set aside the order of the Deputy Collector of the 16th August 1917 ordering the attachment and sale of the appellant's village, but an interim stay of that order had been granted by the High Court and communicated to the Deputy Collector, which appears to have given him some reason to suspect that his previous orders imposing fines and penalties might be open to criticism, and on this occasion he declined to pass any order until the High Court should have disposed of the application then pending before it.

The matter was then transferred to the file of another Deputy Collector and the Commissioners proceeded to record evidence upon the matters referred to them until the 12th March 1919. Upon that day the Commissioners having applied to the Deputy Collector for instructions as to whether they were to record evidence on behalf of the respondent in addition to that already on the record and whether they were to allow the appellant to cross-examine the respondent's witnesses, the Deputy Collector passed an order that there should be no cross-examination of the respondent's witnesses. The Deputy Collector did not state in making that order under what rule of practice or procedure he purported to act. An application for review of that order was rejected on the 12th May 1919, on the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction in the matter. On that occasion it was stated that the order made on the 12th March would appear to have been made under the provisions of Order XI, rule 21, of the Civil Procedure Code.

It is from the order passed on the 12th March 1919 that the present appeal is preferred to this Court. If that order was passed under the provisions of Order XI, rule 21, an appeal undoubtedly lies to this Court. As, however, the appellant not unnaturally has some doubt as to whether the order in question could have been made by the Deputy Collector in the circumstances stated under the provisions of that rule, he has also filed a petition asking the Court to deal with the matter under its powers of revision or superintendence. The first question for determination is whether the order appealed from can be said to have been made under the provisions of Order XI, rule 21. That rule provides that:

"Where any party fails to comply with any order to answer interrogatories, or for discovery or inspection of documents, he shall, if a plaintiff, be liable to have his suit dismissed for want of prosecution, and, if a defendant, to have his defence, if any, struck out, and to be placed in the same position as if he had not defended, and the party interrogating or seeking discovery or inspection may apply to the Court for an order to that effect, and an order may be made accordingly."

This is clearly not a case of failure to comply with an order to answer interrogatories, but it is urged before us that it is a case of failure to comply with an order for discovery or inspection of documents and that, therefore, the penalties imposed by the rule for failure to comply with such an order might in the present case be brought into operation.

It will be observed that the penalty imposed is not in terms that which is prescribed by the rule, but it may be assumed that if the prescribed penalty had been imposed, the result would have been to prevent the appellant from appearing and challenging the respondent's evidence as in the case of an undefended suit. I am unable, however, to accept the contention that there was any failure by the appellant to comply with an order for discovery or inspection of documents within the meaning of rule 21. The penalty imposed is of a highly penal nature and will only be used in extreme cases and as a last resort [see Sham Kishore Mundle v. Shoshibhoosun Biswas (1)], and should in no case be imposed unless there is a clear failure to comply with the obligation laid down in the rule. The orders for discovery or inspection therein mentioned are such as are contemplated in the earlier rules of the same Order. No order for discovery or inspection of documents within the meaning of these rules was ever made and consequently there could be no failure to comply with such an order, and the Deputy Collector had no power under rule 21 to deprive the appellant of his right to cross examine the opposite party's witnesses. Rules 12 to 20 of Order XI deal with matters relating to discovery and inspection of documents. By rule 12 the Court may on the application of any party make an order directing any other party to make discovery on oath of the documents which are or have been in his possession or power relating to the matters in question in the suit. An order so made is complied with by swearing an affidavit in the prescribed form referred to in rule 13. The form of affidavit is that set out in Appendix C and requires a full disclosure upon oath of all material documents which are in the possession or power of the party as well as of those which have been but are no longer in his possession or power, and with regard to the latter the deponent must state to the best of his knowledge when the documents were last in his possession and what has become of them and in whose possession they are. By rule 15 if the party refuses without good cause or excuse to give inspection of any document referred to in his pleadings or affidavits after being served with a proper notice to produce it for inspection, he will not be entitled afterwards to use such document in evidence on his behalf. It is, however, a good cause for non production if the document is not in his possession or power. He may also refuse to produce documents for which he claims privilege or, in the case of a defendant, where they relate to his title. By rule 18 the Court has power to order a party to give inspection of the documents mentioned in rule 15, but with regard to documents not disclosed by the party or referred to in his pleadings or affidavits an application to inspect them must be founded upon an affidavit of the party requiring inspection, showing that he is entitled to inspection and that the documents required are in the possession or power of the other party. The rule does not say that the Court will even then make an order, if the party from whom inspection is required denies that the particular documents required are in his possession. The usual course is to order him to state the same on oath in an affidavit. It is now well established that the affidavit of documents required from the party under rules 12 and 13 is in ordinary circumstances to be taken as conclusive on the question of what documents are in his possession or power. The object of this procedure is two fold, first, to secure as far as possible that all material documents are disclosed by putting the party upon oath as to the documents in his possession or power with the consequent penalties attaching to a false oath, and secondly, to put an end to what might otherwise lead to a protracted inquiry as to the material documents actually in the possession or under the control of the party. Where, however, an application is made under the second clause of rule 18 for inspection of documents not mentioned in the pleadings or affidavits of the opposite party, this, as already stated, must be accompanied by an affidavit swearing that the documents required are in the possession of the opposite party. To this extent a party is allowed to falsify the affidavit of documents already made by his opponent, but as also stated, this does not entitle him immediately to an order, and if the opposite party again swears an affidavit to the effect that the documents are not in his possession or power, the Court will regard this as final and conclusive. The English rules on the subject of discovery and inspection are practically identical with those contained in the Civil Procedure Code,

(1) 5 C. 707; 5 C. L. R. 509; 2 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 1057.

In Wiedeman v. Walpole (2) the question for decision was whether that part of Order XXXI, rule 18, of the Rules of the Supreme Court in England which corresponds to Order XI, rule 18 (2), of the Civil Procedure Code had any application at all when an affidavit of documents had already been made by the other side disclosing on oath the documents in their possession. It was held that it did apply even where an affidavit of documents had been sworn, but in referring to the procedure which should be adopted in such a case Vaughan Williams, J., stated the matter thus:—

"To my mind the proper course is to entertain the application upon an affidavit by the applicant as to the other side's possession of the documents, and as to their relevancy, and then to allow the other party to make an affidavit in answer. I may say for myself, although the question does not arise here, that, in my judgment, if the other party does make such an affidavit in answer, his affidavit, when made, is conclusive in the same way as his affidavit of documents is conclusive on the subject of discovery."

This decision was referred to with approval and followed by Sir Stephen Sale (as he afterwards was) in the case of Nittomoye Dassee v. Seobul Chunder Law (3). After referring to the passage quoted the learned Judge said:—

"What I understand the learned Judge to lay down is that, just as for the purposes of discovery an affidavit of documents denying possesion is conclusive, so for the purposes of production and inspection an affidavit denying possession of such documents would be equally conclusive. Obviously it would be futile to order a party to produce a document which he swears is not in his possession."

I entirely agree with the remarks of the learned Judge as to the futility of ordering a party to produce documents which he swears on oath are not in his possession or power. He is in the best position to be able to know whether he has the documents or not, and apart from positive proof that his sworn statement is untrue, it would in many cases work manifest injustice if on mere suspicion a party should be ordered under severe penalties to do that which he is physically incapable of performing. It may be that in some cases a party may gain an advantage by swearing a false affidavit, but the risk he runs thereby is considered in most cases to be a sufficient deterrent and the advantages of the practice followed in accepting his oath as conclusive far outweigh the disadvantages which might result from following any other course.

It is true that under Order XI, rule 14, the Court may at any time order the production by any party upon oath of documents in his possession or power relating to matters in question in the suit, but no order will be made under this rule against a party unless he has directly or indirectly admitted the document to be in his possession or power.

I have already stated that Order XI, rule 21, has no application to the circumstances of this case, as no order for discovery or inspection of document was made within the meanirg of that rule. It has, moreover, been held in England that the rule has no application to an order for accounts made under Order XV of the English Rules [see Pike v. Keene (4)], and I see no reason for doubting that the same rule should be followed in this country. It follows, in my judgment, that the order complained of not having been made under Order XI, rule 21, no appeal lies to this Court. That, however, does not exhaust our powers in the present instance. It seems to me that the Deputy Collector had no jurisdiction to make the order in question. It is undoubtedly within the powers of the Judge to prevent irrelevant cross-examination and indeed it is his duty to do so, but I know of no practice which gives him the power to deny absolutely to a party the right of cross-examination. Even if it be conceded that such a power exists, I think we should be justified in holding that in the present instance it was exercised with material irregularity. The appellant has definitely sworn on affidavit and, so has his Manager, Mr. Downing, that the documents required are not in their possession or power. No evidence has been given to falsify the affidavit, and during the course of the argument in answer to a question put to him the learned Counsel for the respondent admitted that his client could not swear that the documents were in the possession of the appellant. In such a case applying by analogy the practice prevailing in cases of discovery and inspection to the present circumstances, it would be a manifest and unwarrantable injustice to penalize the appellant for failing to comply with an order which he must be deemed to be physically incapable of complying with. It was held in Dhapi v. Ram Pershad (5) that the High Court had power under section 622 of Act XIV of 1882, now section 115 of the Civil Procedure Code, to set aside an interlocutory order made without jurisdiction, the word "case" in that section, as in the present, being wide enough to include such an order, although in the later case of Chandi Roy v. Kirpal Roy (6) the question was considered to be doubtful. In that case the question was whether an order refusing leave to amend the pleadings should be dealt with by the Court under its powers of revision or superintendence. The Court held that the order complained of not being likely to cause irreparable injury should not be interfered with under the Charter Act but might be dealt with on appeal from the final decree. It may be true that an appeal would lie in the present case from the final decree when the questions now raised could be dealt with, but Carnduff, J., one of the Judges who decided that case, distinguished it from the earlier case of Amjad Ali v. Ali Hussain Johar (7), to which he had been a party and which decided that the Court would interfere with an interlocutory order if irreparable injury would be caused to one of the litigants if matters were not set right. In referring to that case the learned Judge said:

"If that order had been allowed to stand, there would have followed protracted and costly proceedings, which in the end would ...most certainly have been set aside. The case was, therefore, an extreme one, and I would also point out that...it was not then disputed before us that the Court had jurisdiction under section 15 of the Charter to set it aside."

In the present case a large number of witnesses have been examined and it is proposed to examine many more, and if the appellant is not allowed to cross-examine these witnesses, it is clear that protracted and costly proceedings which in the end would certainly be set aside must result. To obviate such a course I think the Court is clearly entitled under its powers of superintendence to deal with this matter now and to order that the order of the Deputy Collector, dated the 12th March 1919, refusing the appellant the right to cross-examine the respondent's witnesses should be set aside.

As no appeal lies, the appeal will be dismissed but without costs. The application in revision is allowed with costs.

Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act (VII of 1868), s. 12 (3), (4)—Improvements—Ejectment—Tenant, when protected from ejectment.

Clause (4) of section 12 of the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act affords protection to a tenant from ejectment in the case of those improvements only which are made by the tenant himself or by some previous holder of the land, and clause (3) of that section protects a tenant from ejectment whose interest has been recognised in the settlement proceedings at the last temporary settlement and the rent has been fixed under the rent law for the period of that settlement. Appeal against the decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Chittagong, dated the 5th of September 1918, reversing that of the Munsif, 4th Court at Patiya, dated the 20th of August 1917.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Chandra Sekhar Sen, (with him Babu Provat Chandra Dutt), for the Appellants.—This appeal arises out of a suit for khas-possession on the strength of a purchase by the plaintiff under Act XI of 1859 and Act VII of 1868. The land is admittedly within a Noabad Settlement. The plaintiff's case was that he was entitled to annul incumbrances. The defence was that they held the lands as occupancy ryots and that there were valuable fruit trees and cremation grounds on the land. The case would be governed by section 12 of the Act VII of 1868 or section 37 of Act XI of 1859. I claim under section 14 and section 12, clauses (3) and (4), of Act VII of 1868. The first Court held that the plaintiff was not entitled to eject the defendant. The lower Appellate Court, without considering the findings of the first Court decreed the suit. I submit upon the findings I am not a ryot. I may be a tenure-holder. Under section 12, clause (3), my interest would be protected as such. There are 3 tanks, vegetable gardens and cremation grounds. The existence of these on the land ought to have been considered by the learned Court of Appeal below. Then in the Settlement proceedings I have been recorded as an occupancy ryot. The Court ought to have considered the presumption value of the Khatian. The learned Judge seems to think that there must be a lease first and then the excavation of tanks, etc., [Refers to Ajgur Ali v. Asmut Ali (1)]. It does not matter who excavates the tank. I have been on the land for 25 years. I am, therefore, entitled to protection [Refers to Najemoddeen Moonshi v. Syed Hassan Hyder (2)]. Even assuming that I have no right to the tanks, the first Court found, which finding has not been displaced, that there are vegetable gardens and cremation grounds, etc. I would, therefore, be entitled at least to that portion as protected. Refers to Wahid Ali v. Rahat Ali (3). The Court of Appeal ought to have considered my status.

Babu Sarat Chandra Rai Chaudhuri (with him Babu Satya Charan Singha), for the Respondent.—The Judge is perfectly right in his construction of section 12, clause (4) of Act VII of 1868, and section 37, clause (4) of Act XI of 1859. The law does not contemplate that the proprietor shall not be able to sell such lands as described in clause (4). The protection is given on the principle of improvement by tenant. The case of Ajgur Ali v. Asmut Ali (1) supports my contention. The question is whether the improvement is effected by the lessee or not. Here the tanks were in the possession of the talukdar whose taluk was sold. The defendant is not entitled to protection as he did not effect any improvement on the land. Refers to Asmat Ali v. Hasmat Khan (4). As regards the vegetable garden, he must show that the garden consisted of valuable trees. Neither has he shown that he is a tenure-holder. I submit the findings of the learned Judge are conclusive and his view of the law is quite correct.

Babu Chandra Sekhar Sen replied in brief.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal against a decree in ejectment. The plaintiff was a purchaser at a sale of a Noabad Taluq under the provisions of Act VII of 1868. The defendants are the tenants of a holding which was let out to them as a tank. The question is whether the defendants are protected by any of the clauses of section 12 or by section 14 of Act VII of 1868. The first Court held that the defendants were ryots with rights of occupancy and were, therefore, protected under section 14 and also protected under clause (4) of section 12, as they had a house and a garden on the banks of the tank. The lower Appellate Court has reversed this decision and has given the plaintiff a decree for khas possession.

The first point urged was that as admittedly a tank was made on the land, the fourth clause of section 12 must be applicable. My attention has been drawn to the decision of this Court in the case of Ajgur Ali v. Asmut Ali (1) and it is contended that it is immaterial whether the tank was created before or after the creation of the tenancy. In that case the trying Court refused protection to the tenants on the ground that there was no evidence that the defendants had sunk ponds and planted a garden, and the High Court pointed out that it did not matter whether the improvements had been effected by the present holder or by some previous occupier. I think that the contention of the learned Pleader for the respondent is right and that that clause of section 12 is only intended to preserve the rights arising from the improvements themselves, that is to say, unless the land of the tenancy is improved there is no reason why there should be any protection. All that the ruling, referred to, laid down, was that it was immaterial which holder of the land created the improvements. But it did not lay down that it was immaterial whether the improvements were created by the tenants or were in existence before the tenancy was created. Unless they are created by the tenants, they will not be improvements. I, therefore, hold that the ruling cited is of no assistance to the appellants. But it appears to me that they are entitled to succeed on the other ground urged. They were recorded in the Record of Rights as occupancy ryots. If this is right, they will be entitled to protection under section 14. The learned Subordinate Judge has, however, held that they cannot be occupancy ryots because the tanks were let out as independent holdings by themselves and not included in any ryoti holding and that the tank by itself cannot be the subject matter of a raiyati holding. If the interest of the defendants is not that of ryots, then they must have some other kind of tenancy. If the land is not agricultural land as has been held, the tenancy right will be transferable and will be a tenure as defined in section 1 of the Land Revenue Sales Act. Whatever their interest is, it has been recognised in the settlement proceedings at the last temporary settlement and the rent has been fixed under the rent law for the period of such settlement. That gives them the right of protection under clause 3 of section 12. I, therefore, hold that it is immaterial whether they are occupancy ryots or not, and that in either case they are entitled to protection, either under clause 3 of section 12, or under section 14. Taking this view, I must decree this appeal and reverse the judgment and decree of the lower Appellate Court and restore the decree of the first Court.

The appellants will get their costs in this Court and in the lower appellate Court.

Bombay Land Revenue Code (Act V of 1879), s. 83, presumption under—Landlord and tenant—Origin of tenancy unknown—Nature of tenancy—Permanent tenant—Enhancement of rent—Landlord, right of.

Where the origin of a tenancy cannot be ascertained and no satisfactory evidence of its commencement is forthcoming, the presumption allowed by section 83 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code arises, and the person in occupation must be taken to be a permanent tenant, but not a Mirasi tenant. [p. 290, col. 1.]

In the case of a permanent tenant, not an occupancy tenant, the landlord has the right by usage to enhance the rent, and an enhancement to the extent of three times the assessment is not unreasonable. [p. 290, cols. 1 & 2.]

Appeal from the decision of the Assistant Judge with appellate powers at Satara, in Appeal No. 256 of 1916, amending the decree passed by the Second Class Subordinate Judge at Patan, in Civil Suit No. 455 of 1913.

Mr. A. G. Desai, for the Appellant.

Mr. M. V. Bhat, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The plaintiff sued to recover possession of the plaint lands together with Rs. 2·0 6 for past damages and costs, alleging that the plaint properties were of his ancestral Inami and Mirasi rights, that the lands were let to defendant on an annual oral tenancy, that the defendant did not pay rent regularly, and that defendant was called upon to pay enhanced rent, but he refused. The plaintiff prayed that in case actual possession could not be allowed to be given, then in the alternative enhanced rent at Rs. 30 per year should be given.

The trial Court allowed the claim. In appeal the decree was reversed and enhancement was awarded at the rate of the assessment fixed by the Revision Survey. The learned Judge expressed the opinion that if he was wrong on the question of enhancement, the maximum enhancement should be three times the assessment,

Now the title of the plaintiff is perfectly clear. It is based on a Sanad granted in 1727 by King Shahu Chatrapati of Satara to Narsinhacharya Bin Narsinhabhat of 20 bighas. The said Narsinhacharya then made a gift of 10 bighas in favour of plaintiff's ancestor Narayanacharya Bin Madhavacharya about 1730, and thereafter at the request of the donee, an order (Exhibit 63) was issued by which the gift to Narayanacharya was recognised, and it was ordered that the 10 bighas should be continued in Inam to the said Narayanacharya and his heirs. It is quite clear from the wording of Exhibit 63 that what was granted was the soil and not merely the royal share of the revenue. The defendants admittedly are tenants in occupation of the land, and it has been found by both Courts that the origin of the tenancy cannot be ascertained and no satisfactory evidence of its commencement is forthcoming. Therefore, the presumption allowed by section 83 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code arises, and defendants must be taken to be permanent tenants. But it does not follow from that that they are Mirasi tenants. Section 83 says nothing whatever about Mirasi tenure. Therefore, if the defendants are permanent tenants, they are subject to the saving clause in section 83 which says: "Nothing contained in this section shall affect the right of the landlord (if he have the same either by virtue of agreement, usage or otherwise) to enhance the rent payable, or services renderable, by the tenant."

It cannot be disputed that the landlord has in the case of a permanent tenant, not an occupancy tenant, the right by usage to enhance the rent. It seems to have been the opinion of the lower Appellate Court that there had been an alienation in this case of a definite share of the village, so that section 216, taken together with section 217, of the Bombay Land Revenue Code applied. But the phrase "a definite share of the revenue of a village" or "the definite share of a village" is perfectly well-known in these Courts, and it cannot be said that a grant of 20 bighas or 10 bighas out of the cultivated area of a village can be construed as a grant of a definite share of a village. The result is the only section that applies is section 83. Therefore, the plaintiff in this case has a right to enhance to a reasonable extent. It is not disputed that the enhancement which the lower Appellate Judge considered reasonable, namely, three times the assessment, is unreasonable. Therefore, in my opinion the order of the lower Appellate Court in this and the companion appeals must be modified, and the plaintiff will be entitled in each suit to a declaration that he is entitled to recover enhanced rent at the rate of three times the assessment. The appellant will be entitled to the costs of this and the companion appeals Nos. 134 to 137 of 1918.

HEATON, J.—We are dealing here with land in a surveyed unalienated village. The land was originally granted to the plaintiff's predecessors very many years ago, and has now become 5 Survey Numbers in this surveyed unalienated village. I gather from the judgments of the Court below that these survey numbers are entered in the name of the plaintiff who is the holder, and who holds on special terms, but they are cultivated by other persons. The plaintiff claims that those other persons are his tenants. He said that they were annual tenants. But at any rate he claims that they are tenants, and that as such he has a right to demand increased rent from them. They reply that they are Mirasdars and that the plaintiff was entitled only to receive the fixed assessment or Akar on the land. In this appeal we are really only concerned with this question: whether the plaintiff is entitled to receive only the assessment, or whether he is entitled to demand more. The lower Appellate Court held that the plaintiff was entitled only to receive the assessment, and the plaintiff has now appealed to this Court. I am unfortunately unable to follow the reasoning of the lower Appellate Court. But I think at any rate his judgment displays some confusion in the use of the word 'Mirasdar.' The word is used in two senses. It is used, as I think somewhat incorrectly, to mean 'a permanent tenant.' It is also used, as I think correctly, to mean 'a person who has the occupancy rights of land,' that is to say, who is an occupant and not a tenant. If these two meanings are kept quite clear, it does not perhaps greatly matter that you use the word 'Mirasdar' meaning a 'tenant,' provided that you realise when you are so using it that you are speaking of a tenant. Now in this case it has not been found, and I do not suppose it could be found, on the materials in the case that the defendants are Mirasdars in the sense that they have rights of occupancy, and are not tenants. I will here refer for a moment to the word 'occupant' as defined in the Land Revenue Code: which is that it means 'a holder in actual possession of unalienated land, other than a tenant'. That is to say an 'occupant' is not a 'tenant'. He has higher rights than a tenant, and there are occupants with such rights even of alienated lands. But the finding in this case is merely that the defendants are permanent tenants, a conclusion that is reached by applying section 83. Now that conclusion as a finding cannot, I think, be challenged in second appeal. But if it were challenged, the answer would certainly be very easy. The facts as disclosed by the judgments of the lower Courts show absolutely conclusively that no satisfactory evidence is forthcoming of the commencement of the tenancy. There is a tenancy, but when it began or how it began we do not know, and cannot ascertain because of the length of time that has passed since its beginning. That is precisely the case to which section 83 of the Land Revenue Code applies, and there can, I think, be no doubt the lower Courts correctly arrived at the conclusion that the defendants were permanent tenants. But I think the lower Appellate Court was wrong in the legal inferences that it drew from that position. Section 83 specifically provides that the rent can be enhanced by the landlord, if he has that right either by virtue of agreement, usage or otherwise. No doubt the landlord cannot plead that he has the right by virtue of agreement, but the usage is very widely known and well-understood. Permanent tenants who have not the rights of occupancy are liable to have their rents enhanced by their landlords. I think, therefore, that the decree of the lower Appellate Court must be modified by allowing that enhancement of rent which it finds would be appropriate to the case, that is a total of Rs. 111-0-0. which is three times the assessment of the entire survey number. That will have to be split up proportionately amongst the respondents in these five appeals.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 76—Mortgagor and mortgagee—Mortgagee entering into possession as lessee, liability of—Rent utilised for reduction of mortgage-debt, effect of—Puisne mortgagee, position of.

In the absence of a contract to the contrary, it is the duty of a mortgagee, under section 76 of the Transfer of Property Act, who takes possession of the mortgaged property during the continuance of a mortgage, to pay the Government revenue payable in respect of the property out of the income of the property. Where, however, the mortgagee enters into possession not as mortgagee but as lessee of the mortgaged property, he cannot, as a rule, be charged as a mortgagee in possession. But when the effect of the lease is that the whole of the rent is utilised towards the reduction of the mortgage-debt, the position is different and the mortgagee is chargeable as a mortgagee in possession. [p. 292, col. 2.]

Again a prior mortgagee taking a lease subsequent to the puisne mortgage ought to be charged as a mortgagee in possession. [p. 292, col. 2.]

Therefore, where a prior mortgagee in possession of the mortgaged property under a lease subsequent to the puisne mortgage fails to pay the Government revenue and the property is sold for default of payment and is purchased by the prior mortgagee himself, the purchase is subject to the puisne mortgage. [p. 293, col. 1.]

First appeal from a decision of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Monghyr, dated the 27th February 1918.

JUDGMENT.

DAS, J.—The defendants first party are the appellants and they complain of the decree passed against them by the learned Subordinate Judge. The admitted facts are as follows:—The defendants second party who are the owners of certain shares in a village called Ambasarai, borrowed Rs. 16,993 from the appellants and as a security, for the loan mortgaged the village Ambasarai to them. This transaction took place on the 24th May 1901. Subsequent to this transaction the defendants second party created several mortgages on the same property in favour of the plaintiffs. On the 6th July 1905, however, the defendants second party executed a thika patta in favour of the defendants first party, appellants before us, who, it must be remembered, were the first mortgagees in respect of the property in dispute.

The property, while in the possession of the defendants first party, was sold for non payment of January and March kists of Government revenue amounting to Rs. 174 and it was purchased by the defendants first party for Rs. 20,200. The plaintiffs, who are completely defeated by the purchase made by the defendants first party, brought this action for a declaration that the sale was brought about by a fraud committed by the defendants first and second parties and was accordingly illegal and void, and for setting aside of the said sale.

In my view the question involved in this appeal depends on whether the defendants first party are chargeable as mortgagees in possession. In order to determine this point it is necessary to consider the terms of the thika patta in their favour by virtue of which they remained in possession of the property. The thika patta was for 19 years from 13 3 Fasli to 1331 Fasli. It provided that the lessees should in respect of the lease pay a consolidated and uniform annual jama of two thousand rupees and that the payment should actually be made to Firangi Bhagat in liquidation of the principal and interest covered by a roka, dated the 1st of Ashar 1312 Fasli, and the principal, interest and compound interest covered by the registered mortgage-bond dated the 24th May 1901. It is necessary at once to point out that Firangi Bhagat was the karta of the joint family of which the defendants first party were members and that the mortgage-bond dated the 24th May 1901 shows that though it was taken in the name of Firangi Bhagat it was for the benefit of the entire joint family. It will appear, therefore, that the lease was executed in favour of the defendants first party and it provided that the annual rent of Rs. 2,000 should be paid throughout the term of the lease to the defendants first party (and not to the lessors) in liquidation of the debt due to them by the lessors. There is, in this document, no provision as to the payment of Government revenue and it was argued by Mr. Hasan Imam on behalf of the appellants that the obligation to pay the Government revenue was on the lessors.

In my view section 76 of the Transfer of Property Act applies to the facts of this case. The mortgagees did undoubtedly take possession of the mortgaged property during the continuance of the mortgage and, accordingly, in the absence of a contract to the contrary it was their duty, out of the income of the property, to pay the Government revenue payable in respect of the property. In coming to this conclusion I am not forgetting that a mortgagee is not chargeable as a mortgagee in possession if he enters as a lessee of the property. It is clear on the authorities that when the possession is in respect of the tenancy a mortgagee cannot be charged as a mortgagee in possession. But the case of a mortgagee entering into possession by virtue of a lease and paying rent to the lessor must be distinguished from the case of a mortgagee entering into possession no doubt by virtue of a lease but appropriating the rent due to the lessors to the reduction of the debt due to him. We must have regard to the substance and not to the form of the transaction between the mortgagors and mortgagees. When the terms of the thika patta are carefully analysed, the substance of the transaction would appear to be that the mortgagees took possession in their own interest in order that the debt due to them might be paid off.

In the next place there is authority for the proposition that a prior mortgagee taking a lease subsequent to the puisne mortgage ought to be charged as a mortgagee in possession. The principle upon which the doctrine rests is that the rights of the puisne mortgagee against the estate could not be affected after the date of his security by any dealing between the mortgagor and the first mortgagee. This will appear from the case of Gregg v. Arrott (1), cited at paragraph 433 of Fisher on Mortgages.

The position, therefore, is this: the defendants first party have taken a lease subsequent to the mortgages created in favour of the plaintiffs. The whole object of this lease was to create an additional security in favour of the defendants first party. The defendants first party undoubtedly took possession of the mortgaged property during the continuance of the mortgage. In my view, section 76 of the Transfer of Property Act must apply.

That being so, prima facie, it was the duty of the defendants first party to pay the Government revenue in respect of the property in dispute. But Mr. Hasan Imam on behalf of the defendants first party maintained that there was a contract between them and the defendants second party by which the defendants second party agreed to pay Government revenue in respect of the land, and he further argued that on the construction of the thika patta itself it would appear that the defendants second party must have undertaken to pay the Government revenue.

So far as the thika patta is concerned, I am unable to see that there is anything in it to show that the defendants second party did in fact undertake to pay the Government revenue. No doubt the whole of the rent reserved was to go to the lessees in reduction of the debt due to them ; but the Government revenue is payable out of the income of the property. I see no inconsistency at all between the lessors consenting to the lessees appropriating every pice of the rent reserved in reduction of the debt due to them and at the same time insisting upon the lessees paying the Government revenue. It is found by the learned Subordinate Judge that the income of the property is Rs. 3,000, and it would, therefore, appear that there were ample funds in the hands of the defendants first party out of which the Government revenue could be paid. On the construction of the thika patta, therefore, I am unable to say that there was any agreement either way as to the payment of Government revenue.

Next as to the agreement between the parties outside the document. Mr. Hasan Imam's case is that from 1905 till September, 1912, the defendants second party did pay the Government revenue in respect of the property. He admits that the defendants first party paid the Government revenue from September kist 1912 to September kist 1914, that is to say, for two years prior to the time when the property was actually sold for non-payment of Government revenue. Mr. Imam's argument is that in order to see what the contract between the parties was we must consider the unequivocal acts directly following the execution of the thika patta in his favour. With this contention I entirely agree. If it can be shown that directly after the execution of the thika patta the defendants second party for years paid the Government revenue in respect of the property in suit, then it must follow that they undertook to pay the Government revenue. The critical question, therefore, is, did the defendants second party at any time after the execution of the thika patta pay the Government revenue in respect of the property in suit?

Mr. R. L. Dutt on behalf of the plaintiffs says that the defendants first party at one stage denied ever having paid any Government revenue in respect of the land in dispute and that it was only when they, the plaintiffs, produced the chalans in respect of the period from September kist 1912 to September kist 1914, showing conclusively that for this period the defendants first party undoubtedly paid the Government revenue, that the defendants first party changed their case, as they were bound to do, and admitted that they did pay the Government revenue for this period. Mr. R. L. Dutt is clearly right in saying that at one period the case of the defendants first party was that by an agreement between them and the defendants second party the defendants second party undertook to, and did in fact, pay the Government revenue in respect of the land in dispute. This will appear from the 11th paragraph of the plaint filed by the defendants first party in Suit No. 373 of 1915, which was a Suit filed by them to enforce the mortgage executed in their favour by defendants second party (cited in that suit as defendants first party) in 1901. Mr. Kulwant Sahay on behalf of the appellants objected to my looking at the plaint filed in another suit in considering the arguments in this appeal. Now that suit has culminated in Appeal No. 179 of 1917, and that appeal is being heard analogously with this appeal. I am of opinion, therefore, that I am entitled to look at the plaint filed in that suit. Now paragraph 11 of the plaint filed in Suit No. 373 of 1915 runs as follows:—

"That there was an agreement between the plaintiffs and defendants first party that the latter would pay the Government revenue for and other Government demands in respect of the mortgaged property, viz., the leasehold property. Therefore, no provision regarding the liabilities on the plaintiffs for payment of Government demands in respect of the mortgaged property was laid down in the thika-lease, dated the 19th Ashar 1312 Fasli. Defendants first party as proprietors and zamindars of the mortgaged property have been liable for the payment of Government demands and they have been paying the same."

There is no suggestion at all in that paragraph that the defendants first party (the plaintiffs in that action) ever at any time paid Government revenue in respect of the land in dispute. It was then that the defendants produced the chalans for two years in respect of the September kist 1912 to September kist 1914. The chalans are Exhibits A to A5 and they clearly show that the defendants first party paid the Government revenue for two years prior to the sale. As regards the chalans prior to those produced by the plaintiffs the evidence is that they have been destroyed in the Collectorate. This is the sworn testimony of their witness No. 6 and I see no reason whatever to disbelieve this testimony.

The position, therefore, is this:—The defendants first party now admit that they have paid the Government revenue for two years prior to the sale, but they admit it only because the plaintiffs have produced the documents making it impossible for the defendants first party to deny this fact. They still deny that they paid any Government revenue prior to September kist 1912. But as Mr. R. L. Dutt argued before us, it is only possible for them to make this case because the plaintiffs have not been able to produce the documents, through no fault of their own, to contradict this case. So far as the actual oral evidence in this case is concerned, there is the statement on behalf of the defendants first party that they never paid Government revenue prior to September kist 1912. There is, on the contrary, the oral evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs that the defendants first party admitted to them that they all along paid the Government revenue in respect of the land in dispute. In favour of the plaintiffs is this circumstance, that the admission of the defendants that they paid the Government revenue for two years only came after the production of the necessary documents by the plaintiffs. Having regard to all these circumstances, I am of opinion that the defendants first party have not established that there was a contract between them and the defendants second party that the Government revenue should be paid by them. That being so, there was a statutory duty on them to pay the Government revenue. In my view, therefore, the defendants first party are chargeable as mortgagees in possession and chargeable for their failure to pay the Government revenue in respect of the kists for which the property was ultimately sold. It is unnecessary in this case to determine what the consequence would have been if the property had passed into the hands of third parties. But the property being now in the hands of the defendants first party, the only decree that we can pass in this case is that the defendants first party must be regarded as having privately purchased the property from defendants second party. We are discussing this question at the instance of the plaintiffs and not at the instance of the defendants second party and, therefore, it is not necessary to consider whether the defendants first party should be regarded as holding the property in trust for the defendants second party. That question does not arise as the defendants second party have not invited us to consider that question. The question is between the plaintiffs who are the subsequent mortgagees and the defendants first party who are the prior mortgagees. All that I can say now is that the purchase made by the defendants first party cannot, having regard to the position in which they stood with reference to the plaintiffs, be regarded as free from the mortgages in favour of the defendants second party. I hold, therefore, that the decree passed by the learned Subordinate Judge is right and ought to be affirmed.

It appears that there are deficit Court-fees amounting to Rs. 870 due from the plaintiffs-respondents. We direct that the plaintiffs-respondents do pay the deficit Court-fees at once. In default they will not be permitted to execute the decree.

ADAMI, J.—I agree.

JUDGMENT.—The suit out of which this second appeal arises was brought on foot of a simple mortgage executed on the 7th August 1904 by one Ramji in favour of one Jairam. The mortgaged property consists of a house and compound in Mauza Bambhada. The consideration was an old debt of Rs. 199, which was made payable by 12 instalments of Rs. 16 each and a final instalment of Rs. 7, the first on Shrawan Sudi 5, Sambat 1960=16th August 1904 and the rest on Pus Sudi 5 of the succeeding Sambat years respectively. The last instalment thus fell due on the 29th December 1916. The suit was filed on the 15th August 1917.

The plaintiffs are the three sons of Jairam, who is dead. The defendants are Ramji's widow, Jhumki Bai, who has taken no interest in the litigation, and one Gangadas who purchased the mortgaged property and an adjoining house and compound on the 15th July 1912 by a registered document (Exhibit 2 D-2) from one Sheikh Chand. This Sheikh Chand bought the property for Rs. 170 on the 11th August 1911 at a sale held in execution of a decree for sale obtained by one Bhukandas on foot of a mortgage executed by the aforesaid Ramji on the 21st February 1896. Bhukandas instituted his suit in 1908, his cause of action having arisen on the 9th December 1896, but did not make Jairam a party, and it is conceded in this Court on behalf of the appellant Gangadas that a suit to enforce the prior mortgage against the plaintiffs in the present litigation would be time-barred. The property mortgaged to Bhukandas included not only another house and compound but also a malik makbuza plot not covered by the mortgage to Jairam, and the conditional decree for sale (Exhibit D-6) obtained by Bhukandas on the 7th April 1909 required a sum of Rs. 347-12-9 in all to be paid. No copy of the final decee for sale has been filed.

The defence of Gangadas, so far as we are here concerned with it, was that the plaintiffs being subsequent mortgagees are bound to redeem the prior mortgage before obtaining any relief for themselves against the mortgaged property, inasmuch as he stands in the shoes of Bhukandas, the prior mortgagee. He paid a Court-fee of Rs. 15-12-0 on his claim to be redeemed, putting the amount payable at Rs. 250.

The plaintiffs replied that the claim under the prior mortgage is now time-barred and that the defendant Gangadas was, therefore, not entitled to claim redemption. In this connection they alleged also that Sheikh Chand never obtained actual possession under his sale certificate (Exhibit 2 D-1). With regard to possession the plaintiffs replied that Sheikh Chand did obtain physical possession but was shortly afterwards wrongfully ejected by Ramji's widow.

The following are the issues with which we are here concerned:—

"4. Whether the defendant Gangadas's claim on the mortgage in favour of Bhukandas is time barred? Can he not seek relief against the plaintiffs as a prior mortgagee?

5. Whether Ramji's widow was ejected by Sheikh Chand and had the latter taken actual physical possession as he alleged?"

The trial Judge held that the defendant Gangadas was in the same position as if he had sued to enforce the prior mortgage and could only claim to be redeemed within the period of 12 years from the date on which the mortgage money became due, which is allowed by Article 132 of the Limitation Schedule. He referred to the following cases as supporting his view:—

Nidhiram Bandopadhya v. Sarbessur Biswas (1), Nathuram v. Sheolal (2), Mahomed Ibrahim Hossein Khan v. Ambika Pershad Singh (3).

On the question of possession the learned Munsif found that Sheikh Chand never obtained actual physical possession of the mortgaged property but only symbolical possession through the Court, which executed Bhukandas's decree and issued the sale certificate, and that Ramji's widow resumed possession immediately afterwards. The plaintiffs were thus given a preliminary decree for sale on Jairam's mortgage and Gangadas's claim to enforce the prior mortgage in favour of Bhukandas was dismissed.

Gangadas appealed to the District Judge, who upheld the finding of the trial Judge on the question of possession and held that Sheikh Chand's title was already extinguished at the time of the sale in the appellant's favour, more than 12 years having elapsed on the 15th July 1912, the date of Gangadas's sale deed, from the date of the prior mortgage. The appeal of Gangadas was, therefore, dismissed and he has preferred this second appeal.

Jhumki Bai, Ramji's widow, has made no appearance in this Court. On behalf of the other respondents who are the sons of the second mortgagee Jairam, the question whether Sheikh Chand, the auction-purchaser under the prior mortgagee's decree for sale, obtained any kind of possession or not is conceded to be immaterial. For the appellant it is urged that no question of limitation arises in this case, inasmuch as he as representative of the prior mortgagee is not suing to enforce the prior mortgage as against the puisne mortgagees but is merely claiming to be redeemed. It is pointed out that in Nathuram v. Sheolal (2) the prior mortgagee was the plaintiff, not a defendant, and that in Nidhiram Bandopadhya v. Sarbessur Biswas (1) the plaintiffs, the vendees of the puisne mortgagee who bought in execution of a decree for sale based on his own mortgage, were treated in the High Court as claiming nothing but a decree declaring their right to redeem the prior mortgage.

For the plaintiffs it is urged that the effect of the failure to join Jairam as a party to the suit on the prior mortgage is to leave the plaintiffs in the same position as if that suit had never been brought and that the appellant should be regarded as standing merely in the shoes of the mortgagor and so entitled only to redeem the later mortgage.

In my opinion both the lower Courts have misunderstood the position of the appellant. He cannot properly be regarded as seeking to enforce the prior mortgage. He occupier, as pointed out by Beaman, J., in Pandurang Jasvant v. Lakharchand Malji (4), a dual position as holder of the equity of redemption and as a representative of part of the prior mortgagee's rights. As held in Ghasiram v. Jhingwa (5), the failure to implead the plaintiffs in the suit on the prior mortgage cannot equitably be treated as placing them in a better position than they would have occupied if they had been parties to the former suit. That this view is correct appears from the judgment of the Privy Council in Het Ram v. Shadi Ram (6). It is not suggested that the prior mortgagee had actual notice of the plaintiffs' mortgage when he sued in 1908, nor am I referred to any authority which would make the appellant's position worse if the prior mortgagee had deliberately omitted to make Jairam a party to the suit. The appellant, though not in actual possession, is still entitled to maintain a suit for possession against the mortgagor's widow, the respondent Jhumki Bai, and the plaintiffs are not like the second mortgagee in Har Pershad Lal v. Dalmardan Singh(7) already in possession under a decree of their own. Rule 1, Order XXXIV, 1st Schedule to the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, relieved the plaintiffs from the necessity of joining the prior mortgagee as a party and it is clear from their plaint that the appellant was not joined in the capacity of that mortgagee's respresentative but merely as a private purchaser after the second mortgage: the prior mortgage was denied and its establishment has not appreciably altered the position in this respect, for the plaintiffs are still unwilling to redeem the appellant, who, moreover, cannot give them a discharge from the entire burden of the previous incumbrance. In Ram Narain v. Sahoo Bandi Pershad (8) it was held that a first mortgagee in possession under a prior sale may always shield himself under his mortgage and his purchase even though his right to possession may be defective: the principle applicable is that a man having a right to act in either of two ways shall be assumed to have acted in accordance with his interests, and this has frequently been recognized and applied by the Privy Council, e. g., in Mahomed Ibrahim Hossein Khan v. Ambika Pershad Singh (3). In these circumstances I think that the plaintiffs should have been held entitled only to a sale of the property subject to the prior mortgage. That such a decree may be a proper one appears from the judgment of the Full Bench in Debendra Narain Roy v. Ramtaran Banerjee (9). In Manohar Lal v Ram Babu (10) the learned Judges refrained from deciding that in all suits by a puisne incumbrancer to which the prior incumbrancer is a party the Court is bound to direct redemption of the prior incumbrancer. In Murugesa Mudaly v. Ramasawmi Chetty (11) it was stated as well settled that where a suit is instituted by a puisne mortgagee against the first mortgagee who had also purchased the equity of redemption, the puisne mortgagee would be entitled to sale of the property subject to the first mortgage. As decided in Het Ram v. Shadi Ram (6), the effect of the decree on the prior mortgage was entirely to extinguish the mortgagor's right of redemption.

The decision in Nidhiram Bandopadhya v. Sarbessur Biswas (1) really makes for the protection of the right of the purchaser under the decree based on the prior mortgage; for it limits the title of the second mortgagee to redeem by determining it with reference to the date on which the cause of action on the second mortgage accrued, thus leaving out of account the fact that the second mortgagee holds all that is left of the equity of redemption in respect of the first mortgage. To hold that the right of the auction-purchaser who has obtained possession depends upon the date on which the mortgagee's cause of action under the first mortgage accrued, involves making his position worse instead of better as time goes on; nor is it reasonable that his right to retain or recover possession should depend on the cause of action under the second mortgage, which is a matter altogether beyond his control as it is beyond that of the first mortgagee.

The decrees of the lower Courts are set aside. That of the trial Judge is defective in that it does not specify which of the two defendants (Jhumki Bai and Gangadas) is to pay the mortgage-money. The new decree will give such a direction against Jhumki Bai only, Gangadas not being compellable to redeem, but a declaration will be added to the effect that Gangadas by virtue of his interest in the equity of redemption is entitled to redeem, as if he takes this course further litigation will be unnecessary. The plaintiffs will pay the appellant's costs in this Court and in the lower Appallate Court besides bearing their own in both those Courts. The plaintiffs' costs in the Court of first instance will be included in the mortgage money, the time for payment is extended to the 22nd March 1920 and the sum payable will be recalculated accordingly. The costs of the appellant Gangadas in the Court of first instance will be paid by the plaintiffs.

The rights of a grantee under the Government Tenants Act are not transferable except with the previous consent in writing of the Financial Commissioner; consequently a transfer without such consent, whether effected formally or only by conduct, is barred by Statute. [p. 298, col. 2; p. 299, col. 1.]

First Appeal from the decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, 1st Class, Jhang, dated the 25th April 1916.

The Hon'ble Pandit Sheo Narain, R. B., for the Appellants.

Mr. O. Bevan Petman and Dewan Ram Lal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The pedigree-table to be found in the judgment of the Court below explains the relationship of the parties to this case.

The plaint recites that the parties formed a joint Hindu family and that defendant had acquired property (of which details are given) for the benefit of the family and had accounted for it with the exception of the property in suit when disruption of the family took place in 1905, that the property now in dispute was land granted as a yeoman grant by Government in June 1898 and though made nominally in favour of defendant, it was really a joint family property inasmuch as the Nazrana and other expenses of the grant had been paid out of family funds and the defendant had treated the profits from the grant as joint family property. The relief claimed was joint possession as owners of 2/3rds share of the land.

The main defence was that the right of defendant in the land was a mere tenant right, that the Court had no jurisdiction and that the suit was bad in form, further that the grant was a personal grant to defendant in recompense of his services as a Municipal Commissioner.

To this it was replied that the Court had jurisdiction, that a grantee could invest any person he chose with a share or interest in the grant and that the sanction of the Financial Commissioner was not essential to validate a sub-grant by the grantee, whether the right in question was a tenancy or a full proprietary right. The Court below framed two preliminary issues, to determine whether it had jurisdiction and whether the impleadment of the Secretary of State was necessary, but it dismissed the suit apparently (for its reasoning is hard to follow) on the ground that the Civil Courts could not grant the relief prayed for, for to do so would be to interfere with the measures taken by the Revenue Authorities.

The plaintiffs have appealed to this Court and have asked the Court's permission to put in additional grounds of appeal, wherein they assert that the right in dispute is a proprietary and not a tenant right, and for the respondent it is contended that the permission should not be granted inasmuch as the point now urged is a new one suggested to the appellants by the judgment reported as Guru Dutt v. Kartar Singh (1).

Although the issues framed by the Court below do not appear to have warranted that course, the parties in that Court fought out the matter whether the grantee of a Government grant could transfer his grant, and though it was clearly asserted for the defendant that he was a mere tenant there was no counter-contention that his tenancy had matured into proprietary right. For this reason we do not think it fair to allow plaintiffs to argue at this stage that defendant has a proprietary right in the land.

Now the grant, it is clear, was a grant not to the family but to Jinda Ram, defendant, personally, for services rendered, and his interests, which vested in him as provided by section 7 of Act III of 1893, are declared untransferable by section 8 of that Act except with the previous consent in writing of the Financial Commissioner.

It is argued before us that there was no transfer by defendant No. 1 to plaintiff, but if that is so, the plaintiffs have no cause of action. They allege, however, in their plaint, if not a formal transfer, a transfer by conduct and a transfer, however effected, is clearly barred by Statute. We think then that the suit was properly dismissed, not for the reasons given by the Court below, but because the alleged cause of action contravened a Statute.

We dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

PATNA HIGH COURT.

APPEAL FROM ORIGINAL ORDER No. 170 OF 1919 AND CIVIL REVISION No. 231 OF 1919.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXIII, r. 3, O. XXXIV, rr. 4, 5—Mortgage suit—Consent decree, power of Court to pass—Form of decree—Final decree, absence of—Decree, whether can be executed—Attachment, whether necessary—Compromise relating to matters outside scope of suit—Registration, whether necessary.

If a decree is passed in accordance with Order XXXIV, rule 4 of the Civil Procedure Code, then such a decree is incapable of execution until a final decree is passed under the provisions of rule 5 of the Order. But from this it does not follow that in a mortgage suit the Court is powerless to pass a consent decree otherwise than in accordance with the provisions of Order XXXIV, rule 4 of the Code. Order XXIII, rule 3, gives ample power to the Court to pass a decree in accordance with the terms of settlement, and Order XXXIV, rule 4, must be taken as subject to the provision of Order XXIII, rule 3. [p. 299, col. 2; p. 300, col. 1.]

Where a consent decree in a mortgage suit provides that the properties shall remain mortgaged and hypothecated and that if the money due to the plaintiff is not paid by a certain date he would be entitled to take out execution, and default is made in payment of the money, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to go through the formality of attaching the properties before taking out execution. [p. 300, col. 1.]

When a suit is properly compromised but the adjustment consists partly of an agreement relating to matters outside the scope of the suit, if the entire compromise is laid before the Court and the Court is invited in consequence to dispose of the suit, and the Court does dispose of the suit accordingly, then the agreement is exempt from registration although the decree deals only with the subject-matter of the suit and does not deal with the portion of the compromise which lies outside the suit. [p. 300, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT.

DAS, J.—This is an appeal on behalf of the judgment debtors. A preliminary objection has been taken to the effect that no appeal lies, but in the view that I take of the case, it is quite unnecessary to deal with that point. I shall assume that the appeal has been properly brought to this Court.

It has been urged in the first place that the decree is incapable of execution until a final decree in the form provided by Order XXXIV, rule 5, had been passed by the Court. In my view the objection is unsustainable. Mr. Sushil Madhav Mullick's argument is that the suit which resulted in the decree was a mortgage suit and, therefore, it was incumbent on the Court to pass a decree in accordance with Order XXXIV, rule 4. His next argument is that if it was incumbent on the Court to pass a decree in a mortgage suit in accordance with the provision of Order XXXIV, rule 4, then the decree passed by the Subordinate Judge is incapable of execution until the final decree has been passed under Order XXXIV, rule 5. I accede to the proposition that if a decree has been passed in accordance with Order XXXIV, rule 4, then such a decree is incapable of execution until the final decree has been passed under the provision of Order XXXIV, rule 5. But I altogether deny the proposition that a Court in a mortgage action is powerless to pass a consent decree otherwise than in accordance with Order XXXIV, rule 4. Mr. Mullick refers us to the express provision of Order XXXIV, rule 4. He says that the Code provides that in a suit for sale, if the plaintiff succeeds, the Court shall pass a decree in the form mentioned in Order XXXIV, rule 4. That is quite true. But I do not think that there is anything at all in this rule which prevents the parties from adjusting their differences in the suit. Order XXIII, rule 3, gives ample power to the Court to pass a decree in accordance with the terms of settlement, and Order XXXIV, rule 4, must be taken as subject to the provision of Order XXIII, rule 3. Now the consent decree shows that it was not framed in accordance with Order XXXIV, rule 4. The liability of the defendants was ascertained and time was granted to them up to Baisakh 1326, and then the decree provided as follows: "The plaintiffs shall be competent to realise from the property the decretal amount in addition to the amount which they will pay to-day." If there was no provision to this effect, then the decree would be incapable of execution. The plaintiffs would hav to file a suit on the basis of the compromise decree, but this provision gives the plaintiffs a right to take out execution if the money due to them was not paid by Baisakh 1326. It is not suggested by Mr. Mullick that every condition precedent entitling the plaintiffs to sue out execution has not happened. In my view the argument advanced by Mr. Mullick is unsustainable.

The next point is that if the decree be executed as a money decree, then attachment is essential, and as it is conceded that there was no attachment the execution proceedings are incompetent. There is again a fallacy in the argument. The decree is neither a money decree nor a mortgage decree. It is a decree based on compromise between the parties. If there is nothing in the decree itself to indicate that, before taking out execution, the plaintiffs would have to go through the formality of attaching the properties, although they were already attached by virtue of the mortgage, then I do not think that the contention can possibly succeed. There is in my view nothing in the consent decree to suggest that it was necessary for the plaintiffs before taking out execution to go through the formality of attaching the property. The consent decree provided that the properties shall remain mortgaged and hypothecated, and that if the money due to the plaintiffs be not paid by Baisakh 1326 the plaintiffs would be entitled to take out execution. All the conditions being satisfied, the plaintiffs are entitled to execute the decree by sale of the mortgaged property.

The third argument is that the Court should have given the parties time to take objections to the settlement of sale proclamation. That matter was considered by the learned Subordinate Judge in the Court below, and I am not prepared to say that the discretion exercised by the learned Subordinate Judge in not giving time was unreasonably exercised.

The last argument is that the consent decree as passed went beyond the scope of the mortgage suit and was, therefore, incapable of execution. In my view there is no substance in this contention. The question has been debated in various cases with reference to the law of registration, and it has been pointed out by the Full Bench of this Court that when a suit is properly compromised but the adjustment consists partly of an agreement relating to matters outside the scope of the suit, if the entire compromise is laid before the Court, and the Court is invited in consequence to dispose of the suit, and the Court does dispose of the suit accordingly, then the agreement is exempt from registration, although the decree deals only with the subject-matter of the suit and does not deal with the portion of the compromise which lies outside the suit. Now I take this as establishing the proposition that the consent decree is a decree. If that portion which is outside the scope of the suit be not part of the decree itself, then it would be impossible to say that that portion should not be registered according to the law of registration. If that view be correct, then the question resolves itself merely into this. Is the decree capable of execution? In my view on the grounds which I have stated, the decree is capable of execution.

I would accordingly dismiss this appeal with costs. The Civil Revision No. 231 is unnecessary. This must accordingly fail and is dismissed.

ADAMI, J.—I agree.

Partition, suit for—Receiver, whether entitled to demand rent from party in sole occupation of joint property.

Where in a suit for partition of family property a Receiver is in possession of the estate, but one of the parties is in sole possession of an important item of the property, the Receiver is entitled to require the payment of rent from that party. [p. 302, col. 1.]

Appeal against the order of the Subordinate Judge, 2nd Court, 24-Parganas, dated the 7th of April 1919.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Mohendra Nath Roy (with him Babu Nagendranath Ghose), for the Appellant.—This appeal is from an order of 17th April 1919 in a suit for partition. Order XL, rule 1, Civil Procedure Code, refers to the appointment of a Receiver, and Order XL, rule 1 (d), refers to the powers of a Receiver. This will be governed, as regards appeal, by Order XLIII, rule 1 (s). Your Lordships will have to decide if the order is just or proper. This is an order which is open to appeal. I have not turned out my brother plaintiff. There is no such allegation that defendant refuses to give possession to the plaintiff. I am prejudiced by the terms and obligations placed upon me. There was no enquiry made by the Court. The order was made without enquiry and as such it is bad. Refers to Suprasanna Roy v. Upendra Narain Roy (1). There is no finding that I am in exclusive possession of the dwelling-house. If one party chooses to be in exclusive possession, the Court may direct him to pay occupation rent to those who are out of possession. It may be that the whole of the property is not valued at Rs. 100 a month.

Babu Bepin Behary Ghose, Junior (with him Babus Narendra Chandra Bose and Satyendra Nath Mitter), for the Respondents.—Defendants has behaved in a cruel and insulting manner. There is no appeal from this order. When the Receiver was appointed, it was governed by Order XL, rule 1. Under Order XL, rule 1, the Receiver is entitled to take possession of all properties in dispute. The present order is a consequential order and so it does not come under Order XL, rule 1. Every order made by Court in the management of property under a Receiver is not an order under Order XL, rule 1. By way of illustration refers to Kadala Reddi v. Narisi (2). This is not an order directing the defendant to remove from the house. The Judge's order is a proper order. We are willing to pay Rs. 100. The Receiver has not been made a party. Order XL, rule 1 (2), does not affect the question.

Babu Mohendranath Roy, in reply.—We obtained also a Rule. There must be a finding that I am in exclusive possession. The right to demand rent from me depends on my exclusive possession, and there is no enquiry as to fair rent. 'Any person' in Order XL, rule 1 (2), cannot mean a person who is not a party to the partition suit.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal and the connected Rule are directed against an order made by the Subordinate Judge of Alipore in the course of a partition suit. The suit in question was brought by one Satya Charan Dey, the younger son of one Rakhal Chandra Dey, against his elder brother of the half blood, Pulin Behary Dey, for the partition of the family immoveable and moveable properties. The immoveable properties included the family residential house, being premises No. 30, Beniapukur Road.

On the 16th December 1918 a Receiver to the estate under partition was appointed and thereafter, on the 18th March 1919, the plaintiff Satya Charan Dey represented to the Court that owing to the conduct of his elder brother the defendant No. 1, he had been compelled to leave the residential house of which, therefore, the plaintiff remained in sole occupation. He, therefore, applied that the defendant No. 1 should be required to pay, in respect of his occupation of this house, a fair rent, which be put at the sum of Rs. 150. On the 7th April after hearing the Pleaders on both sides, the Court assessed the rent at Rs. 100 monthly and directed the Receiver to realize this sum from the defendant No. 1 month by month. It is against this order that the appeal and the Rule were directed.

(1) 22 Ind. Cas. 601; 18 C. W. N. 533 at p 535; 18 C. L. J. 638.

(2) 24 M. 504.

A preliminary objection to the appeal is taken on the ground that no appeal lies: This, however, is a matter of small importance, as, if we think it right to interfere, we can do so in the Rule which has been issued as an alternative to the appeal.

It has been urged on behalf of the appellant, and of the petitioner who obtained the Rule, that the learned Subordinate Judge made this order without due enquiry either as to the reasons which had led the plaintiff to leave the house or as to the sum which ought to be taken as representing fair rent. There does not seem to be much substance in the second contention. The Pleaders whom the Subordinate Judge heard were, no doubt, in a position to give the Court information as to the rent usually payable in this locality. Moreover we find that the plaintiff, if permitted to occupy the house, is prepared to pay even a larger sum. Whatever be the reasons which led the plaintiff to leave the house, there is no question that the defendant No. 1 is now in sole possession, though it appears that part of the building is devoted to the residence of two family deities. The Receiver being now in possession of the estate is entitled, we think, to require the payment of rent by the party who is in sole possession of an important item of family property now under partition, and, on this view, we do not think that our interference in this matter is called for.

The appeal and the Rule are both dismissed.

The opposite party is entitled to his costs in the Rule, which we asses at two gold mohurs. We allow him no costs in the appeal.

Appeal dismissed;
Rule discharged.

Sheikh Abdul Qadir, for the Respondent.

ORDER.—It is objected that no order for stay of execution can be made, if there is no application for execution of the decree under appeal pending before any Court [Janardan v. Nilkanth (1)] and that no such application has been made.

Counsel for applicants admits that this is correct, and that he has no knowledge of any such application having been made.

The interim order of stay of 11th March 1920 is, therefore, discharged with costs of this hearing to respondent, Rs. 32.

Application rejected.

Actual compelling necessity is not the sole test of the validity of a conveyance or mortgage of the family estate by the manager acting without the express consent of the other members. If without proving actual necessity in the ordinary sense of the term, it can be shown that the transaction was one which was clearly beneficial to the interests of the family as a whole, the transaction would be within the manager's authority, and the consent of the other members would be implied although not expressly given. In either case, however, the onus is upon the alienee or mortgagee to prove that the transaction was for the interest of the family as being either necessary or beneficial. [p. 305, col. 1.]

The mere fact that money is borrowed to enable the manager to purchase immoveable property on behalf of the family does not in itself create any presumption that the transaction was beneficial to the family, so as to authorise the manager to hypothecate existing family property by way of security for the loan. Some necessity for the transaction or some benefit resulting to the family therefrom must in all such cases be shown. [p. 305, col. 1.]

In the absence of proof of necessity or antecedent debt a mortgage of property belonging to a Mitakshara family by its karta is void, and the transaction itself gives to the mortgagee no right against the karta's interest in the property. [p. 306, col. 2.]

Where it is open to both parties to produce evidence concerning the existence or non-existence of a particular fact, the party upon whom the burden of proving the fact lies does not discharge that burden by showing that the other side could equally well have proved the contrary. [p. 306, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT.

MILLER, C. J.—This is an appeal by some of the defendants in a mortgage suit from a decision of the Subordinate Judge of Gaya, dated the 29th May 1917. The plaintiff Ramyad Singh is the mortgagee. The other plaintiffs are members of his family and joint with him in estate. The mortgage bond was dated the 23rd December 1907, corresponding to the 4th Poos 1315 Fasli, and was executed in favour of the mortgagee by Sheodani Singh, the defendant No. 1, and his father Prayag Singh, since deceased. The other three defendants are Ram Bilas Singh and Brij Bilas Singh, the two sons of Sheodani Singh, and Shamrup Singh a subsequent mortgagee The latter, beyond filing a written statement, has taken no active part in the proceedings. The mortgage was executed to secure an advance of Rs. 3,000 with compound interest at the rate of Re. 1-1-0 per cent. per mensem with yearly rests. The suit was instituted on the 27th May 1916, the amount due under the bond for principal and interest being then Rs. 8,269-3-9. The property mortgaged was a 4-annas share in two Mauzas named Doranwan and Adopur which formed part of the joint family property of the mortgagors and their descendants.

Sheodani, the surviving mortgagor, did not appear or file a written statement. As the due date for re payment of the loan was the 11th December 1908, corresponding to the 4th Poos 1316 Fasli, a personal claim against him on the bond was barred by limitation before the suit was instituted. His sons, the defendants Nos. 2 and 3, have defended the suit and plead that the mortgage was not justified by legal necessity and conferred no benefit upon them and that it could not be enforced against the family property. They further object to the claim for compound interest on the grounds that it is a penalty and is excessive.

The Subordinate Judge before whom the case came for trial found in favour of the plaintiffs and passed a mortgage decree in the usual form for the amount claimed against the property hypothecated.

From that decision the defendants Nos. 2 and 3 have appealed. The main question for determination is whether, in the circumstances disclosed, Prayag Singh and his son Sheodani, who owing to the former's age and infirmity was the de facto manager of the family when the mortgage was executed, were authorised to hypothecate the joint family property. It is proved that the money was borrowed for the purpose of purchasing a share in a zarpeshgi lease of three villages in which the family already had an interest and of which they are now, by a subsequent purchase, the ijaradars of the entire 16 annas share. The purchase price which the mortgagors had to pay for the interest in the ijara was Rs. 2,750 and possibly, although there is no evidence about it, there were incidental expenses connected with the purchase which, if the loan can be justified at all on the ground of legal necessity or benefit to the family, might justify the borrowing of an additional Rs. 250. The evidence given on behalf of the plaintiffs proves little more than that the loan was made to enable the defendant Sheodani and his father to purchase the share of the ijara right in the village mentioned. The plaintiff Ramyad Singh who gave evidence further states that the defendants who are joint are deriving benefit from the purchased property, and from the context it is clear that by this he means that not only Sheodani but also his sons are participating in the rents and profits of the property. To what extent, if any, the family was benefited by the transaction, there is nothing to show. The price paid for their share in the ijara was, as already stated, Rs. 2,750. Their proportion of the zarpeshgi money, which they will be entitled to upon redemption, is not very clear but it was not more than Rs. 2,341. What the net profits were after paying the outgoings is not in evidence. The gross rental of the 4-annas share in the two villages mortgaged was Rs. 244 and the first year's interest on the loan was Rs. 382 which, as no interest was paid, rapidly increased at the compound rate. It may be regarded as almost a universal practice amongst landowners of the class to which the defendants belong in this province to neglect to pay interest on a bond until compelled by legal process to do so, and in estimating the obligation contracted by the mortgagor it may be taken as almost axiomatic that in five or six years' time the liability at the usual rate of interest charged will be double the amount borrowed. The plaintiffs admittedly did not enquire either as to the benefit which might accrue to the family from the transaction or whether the family resources were such at that time as to enable them to pay for the purchased property without having recourse to borrowing. The defendant Ram Bilas stated that the income of the family was Rs. 4,000 from milkiat and Rs. 1,000 from khas lands per annum and that their expenses were about Rs. 2,000. He further says that there was no necessity to borrow at the time when the bond was executed, No accounts were, however, produced by anybody and the learned Judge was not prepared to accept his evidence. In this respect I agree with him. I think the defendants' evidence was lacking in candour and not very reliable. But this fact in itself is not sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to judgment. Even assuming that the mortgagors could not raise the money without recourse to a loan, this would not in itself be sufficient to justify the mortgage.

The powers of a manager of a joint Mitakshara family are perhaps nowhere more clearly and comprehensively laid down than in the oft quoted passage of Lord Justice Knight Bruce's judgment delivered in 1856 in the case of Hunoomanpersaud Panday v. Musammat Babooee Munraj Koonweree (1): "The power of the manager for an infant heir to charge an estate not his own, is, under the Hindu Law, a limited and qualified power. It can only be exercised rightly in a case of need, or for the benefit of the estate. But where, in the particular instance, the charge is one that a prudent owner would make in order to benefit the estate, the bona fide lender is not affected by the precedent mismanagement of the estate. The actual pressure on the estate, the danger to be averted, or the benefit to be conferred upon it, in the particular instance, is the thing to be regarded." With regard to the obligation cast upon the lender the learned Lord Justice says in a later passage: "Their Lordships think that the lender is bound to inquire into the necessities for the loan, and to satisfy himself, as well as he can with reference to the parties with whom he is dealing, that the manager is acting in the particular instance for the benefit of the estate." The passage quoted, although it in terms applies only to the powers of the manager of an infant to charge his ward's estate, has been regarded as applicable to the karta of a Hindu family to deal with the joint family property.

Actual compelling necessity is not the sole test of the validity of a conveyence or mortgage of the family estate by the manager acting without the express consent of the other members. If without proving actual necessity in the ordinary sense of the term, it can be shown that the transaction was one which was clearly beneficial to the interests of the family as a whole, the transaction would be within the manager's authority; and the consent of the other members would be implied, although not expressly given. In either case, however, the onus is upon the alienee or mortgagee to prove that the transaction was for the interest of the family as being either necessary or beneficial.

It is not desirable to lay down any general proposition which would limit and define the various cases which might be classed under the term beneficial, as above used. It is clear, however, that all transactions of a purely speculative nature would properly be excluded. On the other hand, the sale of unprofitable or waste lands bringing little or no return, in order to invest the proceeds in lands more adapted to the requirements of the family although of smaller area, might in many cases be just as clearly permissible. Each case must be examined in the light of the facts proved and the surrounding circumstances. The difficulty which presents itself in the present case is that there is practically no evidence from which a definite conclusion can be arrived at as to the benefit, if any, which accrued to the joint family from the mortgage transaction in question. The mere fact that money is borrowed to enable the manager to purchase immoveable property on behalf of the family does not in itself create any presumption that the transaction was beneficial to the family so as to authorise the manager to hypothecate existing family property by way of security for the loan. Some necessity for the transaction or some benefit resulting to the family therefrom must in all such cases be shown. In Ganesa Aiyar v. Amirthasami Odayar (2) it is laid down by the Madras High Court that the sale or mortgage of ancestral lands for the purpose of purchasing other lands can only be justified if there is a clear benefit to the family. In Chiranji Lal v. Ganga Ram (3), where the manager of the joint Hindu family sold a house belonging to the family and obtained in return a usufructuary mortgage over a shop, the High Court at Allahabad at the instance of the sons of the mortgagor set aside the sale. "We do not think," said the learned Judges who decided that case, "that the mere fact of a mortgage having been executed which would enable the vendor, the father of the plaintiffs, to remain in possession of the mortgaged shop and enjoy the usufruct, can necessarily be deemed to be a benefit to the family."

From the evidence on the record in the present case I am unable to find that any benefit to the joint family arising from the mortgage has been proved. With respect to the learned Judge, I think he approached the question for decision from a wrong standpoint. Because the sum borrowed was spent in acquiring the ijara property and because all the defendants enjoyed the produce of that property, he considered that they were benefited thereby and that the mortgage was, therefore, authorised. He did not consider whether the mortgage could be justified on the ground that the transaction as a whole was beneficial to the interests of the family. I think on the evidence before him he could hardly have decided that it was. It was argued before us, as apparently it had been argued before the learned Judge, that as the sons of Sheodani had been instrumental in collecting the profits of the ijara property and had apparently shared in the enjoyment of those profits, they should be taken as having assented to or ratified the mortgage contract. I am quite unable to accept this view. So to hold would be tantamount to deciding that in all cases like the present every member of the family, who did not expressly repudiate all interest or share in the proceeds of the property purchased with borrowed money must be taken to have assented to the loan and the mortgage executed to secure it, although they were not parties to the mortgage. It is not suggested how they were to act or in what manner they were to express their dissent from the transaction. Until partition they could not claim any definite share in the proceeds of the ijara, nor does it appear that any such share was allotted to them or to what extent, if any, they derived any benefit from the transaction.

It was next contended that whether or not the mortgage was a beneficial one was a matter specially within the knowledge of the defendants and that the onus of proof was thereby shifted to them. The case of Murugesam Pillai v. Manickavasaka Desika Gnana Sambanda Pandara Sannadhi (4) was referred to. That case was one in which the question for determination was the validity of a mortgage granted by the head of a religious institution. It was contended that there was no legal necessity for the mortgage. The transaction, which had to be enquired into, had taken place more than 25 years before the institution of the suit. The lender and the borrower were both dead. The transaction had been recognised by several successors-in office of the original borrower, and the only satisfactory evidence obtainable on the point at issue was that of the account books of the institution which were not produced, although they were in the defendant's possession. There was some evidence that the loan was made for the purpose of the muth but none to the contrary and in the absence of the documentary evidence in the defendant's possession which would have thrown light on the question, their Lordships considered themselves justified in drawing an inference adverse to the defendant. In the present case there is nothing to indicate that the question of the benefit or otherwise of the transaction is a matter specially within the knowledge of the defendants. The two principal parties to the mortgage are alive. It was executed some eight or nine years before the institution of the suit. There would have been no difficulty in producing on behalf of the plaintiffs the evidence of tenants and others to show what the actual income of the property purchased was. The plaintiffs themselves also had an interest in one at least of the villages comprised in the ijara. It is true that the books of the defendants might have given the information required by the plaintiffs in a compendious form, but the plaintiffs cannot on that account, where no attempt has been made to obtain the necessary evidence which was available from other sources and where no application for production of the books has been made, get rid of the onus, which lies upon them. Where it is open to both parties to produce evidence concerning the existence or non-existence of a particular fact, the party upon whom the burden of proving the fact lies, does not discharge that burden by showing that the other side could equally well have proved the contrary.

It was next contended that even if the mortgage was not valid as against the interest of the sons of Sheodani, the plaintiffs were entitled to a decree against Sheodani's share in the mortgaged property. This question was discussed at length in the judgment of this Court in the recent case of Amarday:l Singh v. Har Pershad Sahu (5) and decided contrary to the contention of the mortgagee. The principle applied there, which follows the most recent pronouncements of the Judicial Committee, governs the facts of the present case. It is sufficient to refer to the case of Narain Prasad v. Sarnam Singh (6), where it was determined that "a mortgage of the joint family property of a Mitakshara family by its karta, unless necessity or an antecedent debt is proved, is void, the transaction itself gives to the mortgagee no right against the karta's interest in the joint family property." This decision of the Privy Council has been referred to in two subsequent cases which came before their Lordships' Board as finally determining the law on this subject. BANSI DHAR v. SITA RAM.

Etah (7) and Manna Lal v. Karu Singh (8) decided on the 29th July 1919.

It is true that in certain cases, where the property has already passed into the hands of the mortgagee and special circumstances are proved giving rise to an equity in his favour, the Court, whilst setting aside the transfer at the instance of those members of the family who are not bound by the transaction, may do so upon terms that the property be restored in definite shares with a lien upon the mortgagor's share in favour of the mortgagee. It is true also that special considerations arise in cases where the property has been sold or attached in execution of a decree at the instance of the mortgagee. The present case, however, is not one of such a nature and in my opinion it is governed by the principles laid down by their Lordships in Narain Prasad v. Sarnam Singh (6).

Lastly it was contended that section 65 of the Indian Contract Act applied, if the Court should consider that the claim could not be enforced on the ground that it was void. In so far as the contract imposed a personal liability upon the mortgagor it was valid and subsisting, but it is no longer enforceable against the mortgagor personally by reason of the operation of the Limitation Act. Such a case does not come within the provisions of section 65. If the plaintiff has lost his right to sue, it is not because the contract has become void but because through his own laches it has become unenforceable. Moreover, as to the claim against the property, the section has no operation in a case where the parties must be deemed to have known that the contract was one which could not bind it. In my opinion this appeal should be allowed, the judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge should be reversed and the suit should be dismissed with costs here and in the Court below.

OUDH JUDICIAL COMMISSIONER'S COURT.

SITA RAM AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Wajib-ul-arz, entry in, construction of—Custom—Hindu widow, succession of, and power to alienate.

The wajib-ul-arz of a village recorded a family custom regulating the succession of a Hindu widow and her power of transfer in the following words: "If among the wives one has sons and the others are sonless, the latter will remain in possession of the property for their lives without a right of transfer by sale or mortgage and after their death the property will go to the son or sons of the first wife. But if none of the widows has sons, all the wives will be the owners and remain in possession of the property in equal shares with power to transfer, and after their death the next heirs will be the owners:"

Held, that the foregoing provision in the wajib-ul-arz afforded clear evidence of the existence of a family custom whereby a sonless Hindu widow had a life-estate with full power of transfer during her lifetime, and that after her death whatever property may not have been alienated would go to her husband's heirs, but that if there were more widows than one the sonless widow would be allowed to remain in possession of a share for her life-time without any right of transfer, and that on her death the property would go to the son of the co-widow. APPEALS NOS. 1, 20, 23 AND 46 OF 1918.

JUDGMENT.—Kandhai Singh was the owner of a 6 annas 4-pies share in the village of Isapur. He had no children and on his death mutation of name was effected in respect of a 3-annas 2-pies share in favour of his mother, Musammat Jaini, and of an equal share in favour of his widow, Musammat Reoti. Musammat Jaini died in 1887 and after her death the share in her name was recorded in the name of Musammat Reoti in the revenue papers. On the 5th of January 1887 Musammat Reoti executed a deed of gift in respect of 2 annas out of the 6-annas 4-pies share in favour of Rameharan, father of Mathura, defendant No. 1, and of Narpat, defendant No. 2. On the 7th of May 1887 she executed another deed of gift in respect of 3-annas 10-pies share out of the remaining 4 annas 4 pies of a house and of certain moveable property in favour of Mathura, defendant No. 1. On the 5th of March 1898 she executed a sale-deed in respect of a grove included in the 6-annas 4-pies share in favour of defendant No. 3, who transferred the grove to Bansidhar, the defendant No. 4, by a sale-deed dated the 23rd March 1916. On the 4th August 1913 Mathura and Narpat, defendants Nos. 1 and 2, executed in favour of Umrao, defendant No. 5, a usufructuary mortgage of the 2-annas share transferred to them by the deed of gift of the 5th of January 1887. On the 18th of April 1916 Musammat Reoti executed a Will leaving the 6 pies share remaining to her to Mathura, defendant No. 1. Musammat Reoti died on the 19th of May 1917.

Plaintiffs Nos. 1 to 4 in Suit No. 144 of 1916 are admittedly reversioners of Kandhai Singh. They came into Court alleging that on the death of Kandhai Singh Musammat Reoti succeeded to his whole estate as a Hindu widow, that she had no power of alienation and that all the transfers which were made by her from time to time were inoperative and not binding upon them after her death. They sued for a declaration to this effect, for possession of the 6 annas 4-pies share in the village of Isapur, the house, the grove and the moveable property transferred by Musammat Reoti and for mesne profits. Rup Chand, plaintiff No. 5, was joined as a plaintiff in the suit as the purchaser from the plaintiffs Nos. 1 to 4 by a sale-deed, dated 30th of May 1916, of half the property left by Musammat Reoti.

Another suit No. 59 of 1917 was brought by one Kewal Singh against the transferees for recovery of a share of the property left by Kandhai Singh. He alleged that he was the legitimate son of Ganga Singh who was the nephew of Kandhai Singh's father and that, therefore, he was one of the reversioners of Kandhai Singh and entitled to a share in the property. He claimed that Musammat Reoti had succeeded merely to the estate of a Hindu widow in the property left by Kandhai Singh and that she had no power of alienation.

Both the suits were tried together and were decided by a single judgment. The learned Subordinate Judge held that Kewal Singh, the plaintiff in Suit No. 59 of 1917, was not the legitimate son of Ganga Singh and that, therefore, he was not one of the reversioners of Kandhai Singh and dismissed this suit on that ground. He also held that Musammat Reoti had merely the limited interest of a Hindu widow in the property left by Kandhai Singh and he decreed the plaintiffs' suit with regard to the 6 annas 4 pies share, the house and the grove. For the purposes of the appeals now before me it is necessary in the first instance to consider whether the finding that Musammat Reoti had no power of transfer is correct. If Musammat Reoti succeeded to full estate in the property of Kandhai Singh with complete power of alienation, both the suits must admittedly fail and it will not then be necessary to consider the other questions raised in the appeals which have been filed.

Four separate appeals Nos. 1, 20, 23 and 46 have been filed against the decision of the Subordinate Judge. Appeal No. 1 has been brought by Mathura, Narpat and Umrao, defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 5, in Suit No. 144 of 1916. Appeal No. 20 has been brought by Kewal Singh, defendant No. 6, and Baldeo and Sant Bakhsh, defendants Nos. 7 and 8, in Suit No. 144 of 1916 as assignees of a share from Kewal against the decision in that suit, and Appeal No. 46 has been brought by the same appellants against the decision in Suit No. 59 of 1917. Appeal No. 23 has been brought by Bansidhar, defendant No. 4, in Suit No. 144 of 1916 with regard to the grove.

The transferees alleged that there was a custom obtaining in the family of Kandhai Singh under which childless widows succeed to the property left by their husbands with full power of alienation. In support of this contention they have produced the wajib-ul arz of the village of Isapur and have given evidence of instances in the family in which the alleged customary right has been exercised; and oral evidence has also been produced to prove the existence of the alleged custom. The material clauses of the wajib ul arz are as follows:—

"If there be several wives of the deceased of whom each has sons, namely, one wife has one son and the other wife several sons, the son of one wife will own and possess one half of the property and the sons of the other wife will own and possess the other half of the property. If amongst the wives one has sons and the others are sonless, the latter will remain in possession of the property for their lives without a right of transfer by sale or mortgage and after their death the property will go to the son or sons of the first wife. But if none of the wives has sons, all the wives will be the owners and remain in possession of the property in equal shares with power of transfer. After their death the next heirs of the husband will be the owners."

The vernacular words used in the last sentence are malik wa qabiz ba ikhtiar intkal. In the case of Punni v. Chet Ram (1) the terms of the wajib ul-arz were:— "A sonless widow succeeds to her husband's estate. She also has power of making alienation. After her death her share devolves upon her husband's heirs"; and it was held that this wajib-ul-arz afforded evidence of the existence of a custom whereby a sonless widow had power to alienate the property left by her husband, with the provision that after her death whatever property had not been alienated should go to her husband's heirs, and that ruling was followed in Second Civil Appeal No. 272 of 1918 decided by this Court on the 14th April 1919. The terms of the wajib ul-arz in the present instance are even clearer than in Punni's case (1), and as no conflicting decision of this Court has been cited, it would be desirable merely on the principle of stare decisis to follow the ruling in that case.

There are, however, in the present case other grounds on which it seems to me it should be held that the custom relied upon by the transferees has been proved. It has been urged that where it is possible to construe the terms of a wajib-ul-arz reciting a custom in accordance with the ordinary Hindu Law, that construction should be given to it; but in the present instance it must be noted that in this wajib ul arz not one of the other clauses recites a custom which could possibly be construed as in accordance with the ordinary Hindu Law, and it is, therefore, probable that the custom recited in the last sentence of the wajib-ul-arz is also one which is not in accordance with the ordinary Hindu Law. It is also to be noted that in the sentence just preceding the one relied on by the transferees it is expressly stated that if amongst the wives one has sons and the others are sonless, the latter will remain in possession of the property for their lives without a right of transfer by sale or mortgage; and it would, therefore, follow that the power of transfer expressly given in the sentence relied on by the transferees would mean, especially when the widows are referred to as malik wa qabiz, not the conditional power of transfer allowed to Hindu widows but a complete power of alienation. Reading the wajib ul arz as a whole I take it to mean that where there are no sons by any of the widows, the widows have a life-estate with full power of transfer during their lifetime and after their deaths whatever property may not have been alienated will go to their husband's heirs, while if there be a son by any of the widows, the sonless widow will be allowed to remain in possession of a share for their lifetime without any right of transfer and the whole property after their death will go to the son by the other wife. This construction of the wajib ul arz is supported by at least two instances in which such transfers have been made.

The first instance is that of Musammat Gulbi, the widow of Kalian, who transferred a 1-anna 9 pies share in favour of one Gur Bakhsh by a sale-deed dated the 12th of June 1874. The learned Subordinate Judge discards this instance on the ground that the transferee was one of the nearest reversioners to Kalian and considers it possible that the sale may have been made with the consent of the other reversioners, and also on the ground that Musammat Gulbi died only eight or nine years ago and there is still time in which the other reversioners can institute a suit to recover the property. There is, however, nothing on the record to show that Gur Bakhsh was one of the nearest reversioners, nor is there any proof that the consent of the other reversioners was obtained to the transfer, and the mere fact that the transfer was made so far back as 1874 and has not been contested up to the present time is certainly an indication that the other reversioners have no intention of contesting it.

The other instance is that of Musammat Chhabila, the widow of Mendai, who executed a sale-deed in respect of a house in favour of Hira Lal on the 16th of September 1911. The learned Subordinate Judge rejected the instance on the ground that as Hira Lal was the Patwari of the village, the reversioners of Mendai would have agreed to the transfer and also on the ground that as the sale took place only six years ago, the reversioners have still time to contest its validity. No evidence has been cited that the reversioners of Mendai did consent to the transfer, and the fact that although they have succeeded to the other property they have not attempted since the death of Musammat Chhabila to contest the validity of the transfer, is an indication that they acknowledge the existence of the custom. It is further to be noted that not a single member of the family has been produced by the other side as a witness to deny the existence of the alleged custom, nor has any instance been shown in which a reversioner has successfully contested such an alienation.

Several witnesses have also been produced to give evidence of the existence of the alleged custom. Some of these at least belong to Kandhai Singh's family, and they allege that they have heard of the existence of the custom from their ancestors. The evidence of these witnesses taken by itself would perhaps not be of much value, but especially as not a single member of the family has been produced by the other side to deny the existence of the alleged custom, the evidence lends some support to the view which I have taken of the correct interpretation of the wajib-ul-arz. Taking all the circumstances into consideration, I am of opinion that the existence of the custom set up by the transferees has been proved.

The result is that Appeals Nos. 1 and 23 are allowed and Suit No. 144 of 1916 will stand dismissed with costs in both Courts. Appeals Nos. 20 and 46 are dismissed with costs.

Cross-objections were filed on behalf of the plaintiffs-respondents but were not pressed. They are accordingly dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.

MILLER, C. J.— On the 11th of December 1898 Daulat Singh, the defendant No. 1, on behalf of himself and other members of his family, who were joint with him in estate, executed a mortgage bond in favour of the plaintiff, Musammat Dhapi Koer, who carries on a Mahajani business at Monghyr. The bond was given to secure an advance of Rs. 5,100 carrying compound interest at one per cent. per mensem. Nine different properties were hypothecated by the bond including an interest in Mouzah Sabanwa, better known as Dumaria. On that property there was a prior incumbrance in the form of an ijara or sarpeshgi lease to the amount of Rs. 1,745. By clause 8 of the bond in suit it was stipulated that "if the mortgagors should sell that property, then the balance of the purchase money after paying the prior incumbrance on it should be paid to the Mahajan and the Mahajan shall be bound to accept the remaining consideration money and free the property from the security of this bond."

In September 1900 Daulat Singh wished to sell Mouza Sabanwa and approached the ijaradars, who are the appellants before us and are defendants Nos. 6 and 7 in the suit, and suggested that they should buy it. On being informed that it was mortgaged the appellants refused to buy. Daulat then stated that if they would buy, he could get the property released. Abhai Narain Singh and Nathu Singh, two sons of the appellant, Baiju Singh, then accompanied Daulat to the plaintiff's place of business, where they had an interview with Janki Marwari, her man of business and general manager. The plaintiff herself is a purdanashin lady and her business is transacted through Janki. At that interview, according to the evidence of Abhai Narain, Janki, who must be presumed to have had knowledge of the provisions of clause 8 of the mortgage bond, was asked how much he would require to release from the mortgage the property which it was proposed to transfer to the appellants. He agreed to accept Rs. 1,000. At that time it does not appear that any terms had been agreed to as to the purchase price between the vendor and purchaser, but Janki agreed to accept Rs. 1,000 as the balance payable to him in the event of the property being sold and said he would release the property after the Kabala or sale-deed had been executed. Relying upon this promise the appellants took a conveyance of the property from Daulat Singh but agreed to pay Rs. 3,478 which, after paying off the incumbrance of Rs. 1,745 and the Rs. 1,000 to the mortgagee, left a balance of Rs. 733 which was paid to Daulat in cash. The Kabala was executed on the 13th September 1900 and on the same day, whether before or after it does not appear, the Rs. 1,000 was paid over to Janki in the presence of several other persons, including the two sons of Baiju, Daulat, the mortgagor, Shamlal, a Pleader employed by Janki, and Khetish Dass, a servant of the Musammat Janki, was asked to give a registered deed of release. This he refused to do but said he would endorse the bond. Janki then asked his Pleader to write the endorsement. The endorsement was thereupon written out, not by the Pleader but by another man who was present, at the Pleader's dictation and was signed by Khetish Das, who describes himself as am mukhtear on behalf of the plaintiff.

In his evidence Janki pretended, for it can be nothing more than pretence, that he was not aware of the terms of the endorsement or that it purported to release the property. This evidence is in my opinion manifestly untrue. That a Marwari in his position should stand by and see an endorsement written on the back of his mortgage bond without ascertaining what the terms of it were, even if it were in a language which he could not read, is one which I cannot entertain. Moreover the endorsement was dictated by his own Pleader in his presence and signed on behalf of the Musammat, and I have no hesitation in finding that everything was so done with his full knowledge and approval. The release is in the following words: "Having received one thousand rupees kept in deposit out of the consideration money of Mouza Sabanwa otherwise called Damaria, Pergana Ghyaspur, through Nathu Singh brother of Titai Singh and Baiju Singh, vendees of the said Mouza I have released the said Mouza." It is signed by Khetish Das, as already stated, on behalf of the plaintiff and by Daulat Singh, the mortgagor.

The endorsement was never registered. The plaintiff contended that as a release of the property it was worthless because under section 17 of the Registration Act (XVI of 1908) it required to be registered, which formality had not been complied with and the endorsement could not, therefore, be received in evidence or affect the property comprised therein. It was further contended that Janki had no authority to release the property on behalf of the plaintiff.

The learned Subordinate Judge considered that on the authority of Ganga Bakhsh v. Jagannath (1), which followed the earlier decision of the Allahabad High Court in Gurdial Mal v. Jauhri Mal (2), the release did not require registration. He found, however, that there was nothing to show that the plaintiff authorised the release. He decreed the sale of the property in question together with the other properties hypothecated subject to the purchaser's lien for the amount of the prior incumbrance, which they had paid off.

From this decision the defendants Nos. 6 and 7 have appealed. In my opinion the evidence is sufficient to establish that Janki Marwari had full authority to enter into the agreement upon which the appellants rely. From Janki's evidence it appears that he arranged the terms of the loan and of the mortgage in 1918. He calls himself the plaintiff's Gomashta and is referred to by the other witnesses for the plaintiff as her karpardaz and her manager. He states in his evidence given in 1916 that he had looked after the plaintiff's money-lending business for the last 17 or 18 years; that would be from 1898 or 1899, and he says that he is still her chief officer. He further says that no one can speak to the plaintiff direct. Anything that has to be said is done through him and no payments can be made during his absence. All the plaintiff's witnesses agree that the business transactions of the plaintiff are done through Janki, and no one of them denies that he had full authority to act on her behalf. I infer from this evidence that Janki is held out by the plaintiff to be her general agent for transacting on her behalf all matters connected with her money-lending business and that he had authority to enter into any agreement in respect thereto on her behalf. Where a pardahnashin lady sets up in business as a money-lender and it is proved that she employs a manager to transact that business on her behalf and herself sees nobody, it must be taken that she holds out to the public that the manager has full authority to act on her behalf in all matters connected with that business, and she is not entitled, when it suits her convenience, to repudiate contracts so entered into on the ground that express authority is not proved.

It was contended, however, on behalf of the respondent that the release endorsed upon the bond was a document which required to be registered under section 17 of the Registration Act and was not exempted by reason of sub-clause (xi) of clause (2), as it purported to extinguish a mortgage and, therefore, could not be used in evidence. It is not necessary in the view that I take of the facts of this case to decide this point. Assuming, without deciding, that the endorsement in so far as it purports to release a portion of the property mortgaged may be taken to extinguish the mortgage within the meaning of section 17 (2) (xi) of the Registration Act, that was an agreement between the mortgagor and mortgagee. The agreement relied on by the appellants is a contract concluded verbally between Janki on behalf of the mortgagee and the appellants who were not parties to the mortgage, whereby Janki agreed to accept the sum of Rs. 1,000 in consideration of releasing the property in question from the bond. Such an agreement can be made verbally. Relying on that promise the appellants purchased the property and paid to Janki the sum agreed upon. This he accepted but refused to carry out his part of the bargain by giving a valid release of the property. The appellants put themselves in a worse position acting on the representation of the respondent by purchasing the property, if in fact it is still subject to the mortgage lien. In my opinion the respondent is estopped as against the appellants from seeking to enforce the mortgage against the property which is now in their hands.

I would allow this appeal with costs to the appellants here and in the Court below, and order that the decree of the lower Court be varied by declaring that the share in Mouza Sabanwa better known as Dumaria, Pergana Ghayaspur, purchased by the appellants cannot be sold in execution of the mortgage decree.

FIRST CIVIL APPEAL No. 50-B OF 1916.

HIRALAL AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Negotiable Instruments Act (XXVI of 1881), s. 17—Hundi drawn by firm at one place on its branch at another, nature of—Liability under such hundi—Hundis, nature of—Negotiable Instruments Act, when applicable—Bill of exchange and promissory note, distinction between.

A hundi was drawn by a firm at A on a branch of its firm at B to pay a certain sum of money within a prescribed number of days At B the hundi was indorsed to X, who paid the full value of the instrument. In a suit by X to recover on the hundi

Held, that the hundi was not an ambiguous document within the meaning of section 17 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, nor was it a bill of exchange: it was a promissory note and was governed by the provisions of that Act relating to a negotiable instrument in that form, and that both the drawer and the indorser were liable jointly and severally for half the amount, and the indorser alone was liable for the remainder. [p. 316, col. 1; p. 317, col. 1.]

Hundis are negotiable instruments written in some oriental language, being sometimes bills of exchange, and at others promissory notes, and are subject to local usages, and these usages are unaffected by the provisions of the Negotiable Instruments Act In a suit based on a hundi, the first essential is, whether the hundi is a promissory note or a bill of exchange; if it is a promissory note, the provisions of that Act relating to bills of exchange ought not to be applied; if it is neither one nor the other, the Act cannot be applied, the case being governed by the general law of contract. [p. 313, col. 2; p 314, col. 1 ]

The Negotiable Instruments Act deals only with promissory notes and bills of exchange and the distinction between these instruments is, that in a promissory note the executant promises himself to pay; in a bill of exchange he directs another to pay and the person liable is the responsible executant who has signed it and not he who has scribed it for execution by another. [p. 313, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Senior Sub-Judge, Akola, in Civil Suit No. 97 of 1913, decided on the 2nd August 1916.

Sir Bepin Krishna Bose and Mr. Vivian Bose, for the Appellant.

Mr. M. V Joshi, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal has been extremely well argued by both sides, and I must acknowledge the substantial assistance which has been given to me by what was said at the Bar. A certain amount of complexity has been introduced into the case by the application of the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, to a hundi. It is the fitting of the English boot to an Indian foot, the dressing of an oriental figure in a London made suit. The enactment purports to deal with (1) promissory notes, (2) bills of exchange and (3) cheques. The character of each of these classes of instruments is well known in England commercially and legally. In the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, which only preceded by a few months the passing of a somewhat similar enactment in England the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 61)—we are furnished with definitions in sections 4,5 and 6, from a perusal of which it is clear that a cheque is treated as a particular form of a bill of exchange. Therefore, the enactment deals practically with two classes of instruments, namely, (1) promissory notes and (2) bills of exchange. The broad distinction between these two may be stated shortly to be this, that in a promissory note the executant promises to make payment himself; in a bill of exchange he directs some other person to pay. It follows that there are two parties to a promissory note and three to a bill of exchange. Section 7 names the maker of a bill of exchange the "drawer" and the person directed to pay is called the "drawee." But for the fact that there has been some confusion over the matter in the present case, it would not be necessary to point out that the maker or drawer of a negotiable instrument is the responsible executant who has signed it, and not he who has scribed it for execution by another.

The Indian commercial community carry on business with negotiable instruments called hundis, invariably written in some oriental language, and diverse in form, being sometimes bills of exchange and at other promissory notes. They are of course subject to local usages. Section 1, Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, expressly provides that nothing in the enactment shall affect any local usage relating to an instrument in an oriental language. But practice has grown up, at least in the Mofussil Courts in India, to treat every hundi as if it were a bill of exchange, and to apply the above Act bodily without qualification to every case where a hundi is sought to be enforced.

But the confusion that must arise from such a practice becomes evident when it is perceived that a hundi may be a promissory note or it may be a bill of exchange, and that provisions enacted especially for bills of exchange are wrongly applied to a hundi which is a promissory note.

In the present case the lower Court has treated the hundi in suit as if it were a bill of exchange payable at a specified period after date or sight, and has applied section 66 of the above Act to it; and there is a considerable amount of confusion of 'drawer' with 'drawee' in the Court's finding on the 6th issue. The learned Judge appears to have considered that issue to refer to the drawee, whereas it refers to the person who is stated, in the first few lines of the lower Court's judgment, to be the drawer of the hundi.

Where an enactment relating to bills of exchange and promissory notes is applied in a suit based on a hundi, the first essential is to see whether the hundi in suit is in terms a promissory note or a bill of exchange within the definition given by the Act. If it should prove to be within the one nor the other, then the Act cannot be applied, and the case must be governed by the general law of contract. If it is either, then in the absence of pleading and proof that some local usage excludes the Act or any part thereof, the Courts may, as a sound rule of practice, deal with such a hundi as if it were a negotiable instrument governed by the enactment. If this simple course had been followed in the present case, a good deal of the complexity due to misapplication of the law, arising from an inaccurate conception of the facts, would have been avoided.

The facts are particularly simple. The defendants 1 Hiralal, 2 Jankilal, 3 Nihalchand, and 4 Bhagwandas carry on a banking business at Khamgaon under the name and style of 'Dulichand Onkardas,' and have been referred to in the plaint and in the judgment of the lower Court as "Firm A" and "defendant A."

The defendants 5 Aidan, 6 Onkardas, 7 Kedar, 8 Gopikisan and 9 Balkisan formerly carried on a banking business at Akola, under the name and style of 'Deokisan Aidan,' and have been referred to in the plaint and in the judgment of the lower Court as "Firm B" and "defendant B"

It appears that Dulichand Onkardas did a good deal of business with the Bank of Bombay and other firms at Akola through Deokisan Aidan, and in the course of that business entrusted the latter with hundi papers of different denomination, signed as hundis, but left blank to be filled up for them by Deokisan Aidan as required for business purposes. It is not surprising that Deokisan Aidan should have betrayed their confiding friends by using such papers for their private advantage. In Gokaldas Nainsukhdas v. Radhakisan(1), First Appeal No. 37B of 1916, decided on the 5th December 1916, I had one such case before me, in which Deokisan Aidan, having pasted two wholly blank stamps, one on each of a 12-annas stamp signed in blank by Nainsukh Gokuldas of Khamgaon, had written up and negotiated a hundi for Rs. 5,000 for their private use.

The hundi in the present case is of the same kind, as will appear from the following diagram and the translation of the contents set out therein:—

"A E D H

B F C G

In this document two stamps are used. A B C D in the diagram represents one, and it alone bears the signature of Dulichand Unkardas by the hand of Hiralal. E F G H represents the other stamp pasted under A B C D so as to partly cover the stamp. The signature by Aidan goes across both papers, and the body of the hundi is also written across both papers.

It is proved beyond doubt that Dulichand Unkardas made over the Rs. 3 stamp signed in blank to Deokisan Aidan, and that Aidan, the managing proprietor of that firm, added the stamp for Rs. 1-8 and had the body of the hundi scribed at Akola, after which he endorsed it to Raghunathdas Rampertab, who paid him the full face value of the instrument. It is manifest that the document, though following the form of a bill of exchange, is in substance a promissory note and nothing more. It binds Dulichand Unkardas, the executants, to pay Rs. 5,000 to Deokisan Aidan within 61 days from the date of the instrument. The vernacular date given corresponded with the 14th July 1913. Therefore, the due date was the 13th September 1913.

Now I am alive to the fact that in the Law Merchant of England the fiction that the drawer and drawee of a bill of exchange may be the same person has been recognized and that learned Judges have held that where the drawer and drawee of a bill "are" the same person, the instrument is "ambiguous" and the holder may elect to treat it either as a promissory note or as a bill of exchange. Such a position is readily understood when it is pointed out that the same person or firm may carry on business in several places, and a bill may be drawn by one place of business on another. Such a case occurred in Sulleman Hussein v. New Oriental Bank Corporation Limited (2), in which the litigation arose out of a bill drawn by the Mauritius branch of the defendant Bank upon the Bombay branch of the same Bank. It is quite intelligible that though these were branches of the same corporation so that in one sense the drawer and drawee were the same, from the point of view of the Law Merchant they were really different. The Bombay branch could become the acceptor of the bill. The Mauritius branch might know the original payee while the Bombay branch might not known him. I should say, with due respect, that for commercial purposes the Mauritius branch was one person and the Bombay branch another and the same differentiation would be made in law for many purposes e. g., jurisdiction over a suit on a transaction entered into by one branch with which the other branch had no concern.

The case of Harjiban Das v. Bhagwan Das (3) and Harjiban Das v. Bhagwan Das (4) was another case where the firm of Bhagwan Das at Patna drew a hundi on the firm of Bhagwan Das at Calcutta and there, at page 559, the drawer of a hundi on himself is regarded as "the maker of a promissory note." The English case of Miller v. Thomson (5), followed in the Bombay case above cited, is not available in the library of this Court. A clear case of an ambiguous instrument was that in Edis v. Bury (6), where a document drawn up as a promissory note was addressed to another whose name was also written across it.

But no case has been cited before me where such an instrument as the hundi in this case has been interpreted as a bill of exchange or regarded as an ambiguous instrument for the purposes of section 17, Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, or section 5 of 45 and 46 Vict. c. 61 (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882). It seems to me that it would be reducing the Law Merchant to an absurdity to call it so. In common sense, I am unable to see any difference except in form between a promise by A at Khamgaon to pay B of Akola Rs. 5,000 and a direction by A at Khamgaon to A at Khamgaon to pay Rs. 5,000 to B of Akola. It does not bear the least resemblance to a direction by A at Khamgaon to himself at Akola to make payment. In law, in commerce, and in common sense the apparent drawer and drawee represent one person. If an individual wrote "I hereby direct myself to pay you Rs. 5,000 in 61 days" that could not be differentiated in meaning from "I hereby promise" or "I hereby bind myself" to make such a payment. I am of opinion that the hundi in the present case is not an ambiguous document within the meaning of section 17, Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, that it is certainly not a bill of exchange and has erroneously been treated as such by the lower Court and that it is a promissory note governed by the provisions of the above enactment relating to a negotiable instrument of that form.

Aidan assigned this note to the plaintiff by the indorsement made thereon. The indorsement is undated, but it has been found that the plaintiffs are a holder in due course, and there is no reason to doubt that the assignment was made before the note matured. Deokisan Aidan became bankrupt at the end of October 1913. It was alleged in the Court below that demand for payment had been made from Dulichand Unkardas before that happened, but the allegation was held unproved, and that finding is not disputed before me. However, on the 10th November 1913 a demand for payment was made and refused.

The plaintiffs filed this suit on the 17th November 1913 to enforce the instrument. They impleaded the drawer and the indorsee as defendants. They have obtained a decree against Deokisan Aidan, but have been refused relief against Dulichand Unkardas, chiefly on the ground that they had made no presentment of the hundi to the drawee who had never accepted the same and that the delay in demand had operated to the disadvantage of Dulichand Unkardas, who could have taken action against Deokisan Aidan before they failed, if the hundi had been presented for payment at maturity.

The minor plaintiff, Radhakisan, through his guardian, Musammat Sita Bai, has made the present appeal claiming a decree for the whole debt against Dulichand Unkardas, but at the hearing before me legal advisers confined their claim to the extent of the amount covered by the stamp for Rs. 3 which was signed in blank, i. e, Rs. 2,500. I may mention that at the trial allegations were made against the bona fides of the plaintiffs in accepting the assignment from Aidan, but these broke down; and in this Court I heard only the aftermath of them in the argument that the appearance of the hundi was such as to afford sufficient cause for the belief that Deokisan Aidan's title was defective, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs were not a "holder in due course" within the definition of that term contained in section 9, Negotiable Instruments Act. It is beyond doubt that the plaintiffs paid Aidan Rs. 5,000 and though they may have been wanting in the superior forms of commercial care and caution, there was no such dishonesty or culpable negligence on their part as to disentitle them to recover. The position in this respect was fully discussed by Blackburn, L J., in Jones v. Gordon (7) and by the Judges in London Joint Stock Bank v. Simmons (8). The question is one of fact, as pointed by Halsbury, L C., in the case last cited: and it cannot be denied that not only is the negotiation of hundis drawn on several stamps pasted together notoriously common, but such procedure is expressly recognised as legal by the Indian Stamp Act and the rules made thereunder. I am unable to say that there was anything on the face of the hundi in suit which was calculated to place the plaintiff upon any inquiry as to Aidan's authority to negotiate it.

The remainder of the argument before me turned upon the question of presentment. But in Ramkistnayya v. Kassim (9) and again in Phul Chand v. Ganga Ghulam (10) it was held that the maker of a promissory note is not discharged by the holder's failure to present it at due date. I have already found that the hundi in suit is in fact and in law a promissory note. That sweeps away the technical defence based on presentment and acceptance of the hundi as a bill of exchange.

For the reason given in Gokaldas Nainsukhdas v. Radhakisan (1) I hold that Dulichand Unkardas are liable in this case under section 20, Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, to the extent of the amount covered by the Rs. 3 stamp which they signed in blank, and no more. The appeal is allowed, and the decree of the lower Court will be modified by making all the defendants jointly and severally liable for Rs. 2,500 and only the defendants owning Deokisan Aidan for the remainder. As regards costs in this Court the appeal having succeeded only by one-half, I direct that each party do bear his own costs. As regards costs of the suit I consider that the plaintiffs were very much to blame in not demanding payment from the Khamgaon firm when the hundi fell due. It is also clear that as their case was conducted, it gave the makers of the hundi reason for pleading against it as a bill of exchange, I, therefore, direct that the plaintiffs shall recover all their costs in the Court below from Deokisan Aidan only, and not from Dulichand Unkardas, who will bear their own costs. In short the decree will be this:—

(1) that all the defendants do pay Rs. 2,500 to the plaintiffs, and stand jointly and severally responsible for that sum;

(2) that the defendants who form the firm of Deokisan Aidan do also pay, and stand jointly and severally liable for, the remainder of the plaintiffs' claim, amounting to Rs. 2,550, and do pay all the costs of the plaintiffs in the first Court and bear their own;

(3) that the remainder of the costs in both Courts be borne by parties as incurred, Appeal from a decision of the Subordinate Judge, Muzafferpore.

Mr. Nirsu Narain Singh, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiff-respondent for a declaration that the decree obtained by the defendant-appellant on the 27th August 1915 in Suit No. 822 of 1914 is fraudulent and based on false claim, and is illegal and inoperative as against the plaintiff-respondent

In that suit, the present plaintiff entered appearance and filed a written statement, but later on he made default and the suit was decreed ex parte. He then applied under Order IX, rule 13, to set aside the ex parte decree on the allegation that he failed to appear on the date of the hearing of the said title suit on account of illness and flood. His allegation, or in other words his explanation for his failure to appear on the date fixed for the hearing of the case, was found to be false by the trial Court and the finding was upheld in appeal (vide Exhibit A).

The present suit was instituted on the 2nd of February 1917, repeating in paragraphs 7 and 8 of the plaint the allegations made in the application to have the ex parte decree set aside. No further allegation was made in the plaint charging the plaintiff in that suit (defendant appellant in the present suit) with having procured the decree by means of any fraud practised either upon the Court or upon the plaintiff. No doubt in paragraph 10 it is vaguely stated that the ex parte decree was "entirely fraudulent and illegal." The particulars of the alleged fraud have not been set forth in the plaint. The claim of the plaintiff in the ex parte decree is no doubt said to be false.

The defendant resisted the plaintiff's suit on various grounds, and upon the pleadings of the parties five issues were framed:—

"(1) Whether the suit is maintainable as framed?"

"(2) Whether the suit is barred by limitation or principle of estoppel?"

"(3) Whether the suit is barred by res judicata?"

"(4) Whether the decree, dated 27th August 1915, in Suit No. 822 of 1915 is liable to be set aside on the ground as alleged in the plaint?"

"(5) To what relief, if any, is the plaintiff entitled?"

The suit was disposed of by the Munsif on the preliminary points raised on Issues Nos. 1 and 3. He decided both these issues against the plaintiff and dismissed the suit. He held that on the allegations made in the plaint and the cause of action stated therein, the plaintiff's suit for setting aside the ex parte decree in question is not maintainable, and that the order of the Court in dismissing the application of the plaintiff-respondent under Order IX, rule 13, of the Code of Civil Procedure operates as res judicata as to the allegations made in the present case regarding the plaintiff's failure to appear on the date of the hearing of Title Suit No. 822 of 1914 on account of illness and flood.

The learned Subordinate Judge on appeal agreed with the Munsif as to the decision upon the second point (Issue No. 3) in the suit. He also agreed with him in the view that if the alleged fraud consisted in adducing false and perjured evidence, the plaintiff's suit was not maintainable. But the learned Subordinate Judge was of opinion that the plaintiff's case in the plaint was that the suit in which the ex parte decree was passed, was vitiated by fraud and hence the question whether the ex parte decree was fraudulent or not must be enquired into. Accordingly he passed an order remanding the case to the Munsif for the trial of Issue No. 4 and if that issue was decided against the defendant, to decide Issue No. 2 as well.

The learned Subordinate Judge apparently refers to the allegation in paragraph 10 of the plaint already adverted to, wherein it is stated that the ex parte decree is entirely fraudulent and illegal. This to my mind is not sufficient to maintain a suit based upon fraud. Order VI, rule 4, clearly requires that a party relying upon fraud must state the particulars of the fraud in his pleading. This is an acknowledged rule of pleading. As observed by Lord Selborne in Wallingford v. Mutual Society (1), general allegations, however strong they may be the words in which they are stated, are insufficient averments of which no Court ought to take notice. According to Lord Selborne such allegations must be entirely disregarded.

As I read the plaint, the entire case of the plaintiff is based upon the allegation that the ex parte decree was obtained upon a false claim. Whether the claim was false or true, it was the jurisdiction of the Court that passed the ex parte decree to decide and the decree having become final, it cannot be re-opened in another suit except upon the ground of fraud as an extrinsic collateral fact vitiating the proceedings in which the decree was obtained. The present case, properly speaking, is not a suit based upon fraud. Nothing has been alleged in the plaint to show that the decree was obtained by fraud practised upon the Court or by preventing the plaintiff in the present suit from conducting his case properly by tricks or misrepresentations which would amount to fraud. The case of Kasiswar Goswami v. Amiruddin (2) relied upon by the respondent does not apply to the facts of the present case. The finding of the Subordinate Judge in that case, "that the defendant managed to get an ex parte decree by placing a false case before the Court," was vague as to whether it meant that the decree was obtained by fraud or only by false or perjured evidence. The case was, therefore, remanded for recording a definite finding. The authorities

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The plaintiff sued to recover in this suit the amounts due on three mortgage bonds passed by the defendant's family. The defendant was a minor and a ward of the Collector under the Court of Wards Act (Bom. Act I of 1905). Three bonds had been passed (1) in 1886 for Rs. 9,500 on a simple mortgage for ten years; (2) a bond in 1887 for Rs. 500 and (3) a bond in 1891 for Rs. 3,200, which purported to be a mortgage with possession for two years. It is admitted that the mortgagee has not got possession. It is also clear that the bond of 1887 for Rs. 500 is barred. The plaintiff had obtained decrees on the other two bonds in 1896 and 1891. The learned Subordinate Judge considered that Article 147 applies, but in doing so he seems to have overlooked or misunderstood the decision of the Privy Council in the case of Vasudeva Mudaliar v. Srinivasa Pillai (1). It cannot be disputed that it is not Article 147 but Article 132 which applies. However, the Subordinate Judge has considered the question whether Exhibit 53, which was a letter written to the plaintiff by the Collector of Satara on the 24th May 1913, saved the bar of limitation as regards the bond of 1886, and came to the conclusion that it did. It has been argued before us that under the proviso to section 16 of the Bombay Court of Wards Act that letter could not be proved. Sections 13, 14, 15 and 16 deal with the duties of the Collector when the Court of Wards assumes superintendense of the property of any landholder under the Act. Under section 14 a notice was issued inviting claims, and it appears that the plaintiffs made an application through the Mamlatdar on the 13th May 1913, and they also sent in a petition to the Collector on the 23rd May in which are recited the three bonds I have referred to. On the 24th May the Collector wrote to the plaintiff: "An application dated 13th May 1913 was made through the Mamlatdar of Walwa, stating that proceedings were going on regarding the amount due from the minor Shivajirao Narayanrao and that its result was not known. On this, he is informed that according to the compromise arrived at regarding the whole of the amount due, we have decided that Rs. 17,000 are to be paid and they are to be paid in the following manner:—Rs. 4,000 are to be paid for the first instalment, and thereafter Rs. 2,000 each year, and Rs. 1,000 for the last instalment. So you and Balwant Narayan are to be present either personally or through Mukhtyar in our office and then the amount of the 1st instalment would be paid by me." The word "compromise" seems to be wrongly used. What the Collector did was to consider the claim under section 16. The letter amounted to an offer of a settlement of the claim sent in by the petitioners. Sub-section (2) of section 16 lays down what should be done by the claimant. Sub-section (3) provides that nothing in the section shall be construed to bar the institution of a suit in a Civil Court for the recovery of a claim against a Government ward or his property which has been duly submitted to the Court of Wards. Then comes a proviso: "provided that no decision of the Court of Wards under this section shall be proved in any such suit as against the defendant."

The plaintiffs contend that although what amounted to an offer by the Collector under section 16 cannot be proved in a suit filed by the claimant if he does not accept the offer, yet the proviso does not prevent the claimant from using the letter as an acknowledgment so as to start a fresh period of limitation under section 19 of the Indian Limitation Act. That appears to us to be the proper interpretation of the proviso read in conjunction with the previous sections. It must be restricted to meaning that if the claimant files a suit on his claim, the Collector's offer cannot be proved as an admission: the claimant must prove his case de novo, and the Collector is not bound by any offer which he may have made under section 16. But we do not think that the proviso bars the claimant from using the offer as an acknowledgment that the debt exists. As it has not been distinctly provided that such a decision or proposal or offer by the Court of Wards shall not be used as an acknowledgment, we think it is open to the claimant to make use of such a decision merely for the purposes of an acknowledgment. Otherwise it would work very great injustice, and certainly in this case would operate as a very great hardship on the petitioners. But the acknowledgment will only save limitation with regard to the bond for Rs. 9,500. It is admitted that nothing was paid on the bond for Rs. 3,200, and a suit on that bond was clearly barred before the 24th May 1913. The plaintiffs have obtained a decree for the amount of that bond and interest from the Subordinate Judge on his finding that Article 147 applies. We think, therefore, that the decree must be amended and that the direction on the defendants to pay Rs. 6,400 with costs by annual instalments must be struck out. The decree will, therefore, stop at the figure "9,500." The respondents will be entitled to the costs in proportion to the extent to which they have succeeded.

HEATON, J.—I agree. The matter of importance and of some difficulty which has been argued at the hearing of this appeal, relates to the meaning of the proviso to section 16 of the Court of Wards Act (Bom. Act I of 1905). There was a decision, what is called a decision in the section, by the Collector, and that decision undoubtedly amounts to an acknowledgment of certain mortgage debts. But it is said that in virtue of the proviso to the section the decision cannot be proved against the defendant. Now I admit quite frankly that if you take the words of the proviso away from the rest of the section, and consider them by themselves, they do undoubtedly mean that the decision is not to be proved against the defendant. If that is what the words say, it is argued we must presume that the words mean that. Of course it is to be presumed that the words mean what they say, and if they mean that, then it is further argued that this decision cannot be proved against the defendant. It does not matter for what purpose you wish to use it. But when you have a proviso of this kind, when you have something which is a portion of a larger whole, then to discover the purpose of its existence you have to look to that larger whole. The purpose of the whole section is very clear. It is to enable the Collector to have an absolutely free hand in making compromises on behalf of a ward, with the ward's creditor. In order that he may have an absolutely free hand, and that he may not be fettered by fears of what may be said afterwards as to what he has done, it is provided that these offers, or decisions as they are called, cannot be proved against the defendant in a suit subsequently brought. Clearly the meaning is that whatever the Collector has asserted or admitted shall not be used as proof of any claim by the plaintiff in a suit against the defendant; and that the plaintiff has to prove his claim fully by evidence altogether outside anything that the Collector in the course of the discussion or negotiation may have written in his decision or offer. But if we go beyond this, if we say not only that the decision shall not be proved for the purpose of establishing the plaintiff's claim, but also that it shall not be proved even for the purpose of showing that the Collector acknowledged the claim, then I think we should be going right outside the intention and purpose of the section as a whole. That is why I think this decision can be proved as an acknowledgment, because I think not only does the section as a whole, having regard to its purpose and intention, not prohibit such a thing, but all that it does prohibit is the use of the decision for the purpose of substantiating and establishing the plaintiff's claim. I agree to the order proposed.

Decree amended.

Second civil appeal from the decree of the Additional District Judge, Delhi, dated the 14th June 1916, modifying that of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Delhi, dated the 15th April 1916.

Mr. Santanam, for the Appellant.

Lala Moti Sagar, R. S, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

SCOTT-SMITH, J.—In the suit out of which the present appeal arises the plaintiff-respondent claimed pre-emption of certain Sardrakhti rights in two gardens and other land sold by Fakhr ud-din to Muhammad Ismail, defendant appellant, by a registered deed of sale on the 23rd November 1914. The Courts below have decreed the claim in regard to a part of the subject of the sale, holding that there was a sale either of agricultural land or village immoveable property within the meaning of the Punjab Pre-emption Act. The defendant vendee has filed a second appeal in this Court, and it is urged on his behalf that the property sold is neither agricultural land nor village immoveable property within the meaning of section 3 of the Pre-emption Act of 1913. In order to see what has really been sold it is necessary to examine the deed of lease under which the vendor held possession of the gardens and the deed of sale executed by him in favour of the appellant. The deed of lease shows that the land was leased waste lagane sardrakhti, in other words, for the planting of a grove of trees or plantation, which is the meaning given to the word "Sardrakhti" in Fallon's Dictionary. The lease was for seven years and after the expiry of that period the lessor was to receive $\frac{1}{4}$th of the produce, flowers, fruits, etc, of the land over which trees were planted. Another condition of the lease was that if the lessor wanted to evict the lessee after the expiry of seven years, he would pay the latter the value of his Sardrakhti according to the market rate to be assessed by arbitrators agreed to by the parties. This shows that the lessee was to improve the land by planting trees, and when he was dispossessed therefrom by the lessor he was to receive the value of his improvements, in other words, the value of the trees planted by him. As I understand this term, the lessee did not become the owner of the trees, but was to be entitled to receive their value upon dispossession. Now turning to the deed of sale, I find that all that was sold was the vendor's sardrakhti and by the term as used here, I understand the right owned by the lessee in the trees and not the actual trees themselves.

I now proceed to see whether the subject of the sale was agricultural land or village immoveable property within the meaning of the definition given in the Act. According to the Act agricultural land shall mean land as defined in the Punjab Alienation of Land Act, 1900, but shall not include the rights of a mortgagee. The definition of land in the Punjab Alienation of Land Act embraces six sub heads; and the only one which, in my opinion, can possibly be applied is as "a share in the profits of an estate or holding". Can it be said that the sardrakhti rights sold are "a share in the profits of an estate or holding?" What has been sold is the lessee's rights in the trees and their produce. Now, the lessee's rights are only temporary ones and though, as long as he is in possession as such lessee, he is entitled to keep the produce after deducting the landlord's share, I do not think it can be said that these temporary rights constitute him owner of a share in the profits of the holding. I think the definition is intended to apply only to the proprietor who owns a permanent share in the profits, and not to a mere tenant at-will who is entitled to reap the produce as the fruits of his labours. I am, therefore, of opinion that what was sold was not agricultural land.

The next question is whether it is village immoveable property. There is no definition of immoveable property in the Pre-emption Act and, therefore, I think we must apply the definition given in the General Clauses Act which is as follows: "'Immoveable property' shall include land, benefits to arise out of land, and things attached to the earth, or permanently fastened to anything attached to the earth." In accordance with this definition, trees which are attached to the earth are immoveable property, but as I have already pointed out, the lessee is not the owner of the trees, and I do not think that it can be said that he has sold them. He has merely sold his rights in the trees and that to recover compensation for them when he is dispossessed from the leased property. Has he sold benefits to arise out of land? In the Commentary on the Indian Transfer of Property Act by Shephard and Brown, 7th Edition, at page 14 the learned authors say: "The benefits to arise out of land which are included in the term 'immoveable property' cover such incorporeal rights as a hat, a right to a fishery, a right of ferry, a right to market dues on a given piece of land, or a right to the assessment payable on a sub-tenure." These appear to me to be all permanent rights arising out of land, and there is no mention of any temporary right such as a tenant-at will enjoys in the produce of the land during his tenancy. At page 15 the authors say: "Grass, it is apprehended, in the same way means the present or growing herbage and a right to depasture or to cut grass for an indefinite time would be regarded as a right in immoveable property." I do not think the Legislature ever intended that the term "immoveable property" should include mere temporary rights of a tenant-at will to reap the produce to which he is entitled as a tenant. There is no authority that I am aware of which holds that the rights of a temporary lessee to produce are benefits to arise out of land and, therefore, immoveable property. I, therefore, am of opinion that the subject of the sale is neither agricultural land nor village immoveable property within the meaning of the definition,

I would accordingly accept the appeal and dismiss the plaintiff's suit with costs in all Courts.

ABDUL RAOOF, J.—I entirely agree in the order proposed by my learned brother and it is not necessary for me to write a separate judgment. I may, however, add a few remarks. It is not contended that a claim for pre emption in respect of the Sardrakhti lease would be maintainable. Can then the assignment of the right of the lessee give rise to a right of pre-emption? I am clearly of opinion that it cannot. Under the lease a limited right was created in favour of the lessee entitling him to plant trees and improve the land and enjoy its produce, so long as he was not evicted under the terms of the lease. It is not pretended that a suit to pre-empt the right to occupy the land temporarily could be maintained, but it is contended that the right to enjoy the produce of the trees standing on the land can be acquired by pre emption. The lessee, however, could have no higher rights in the trees than he had in the land. The assignment of his right in the trees, therefore, cannot give a right of pre emption. It would be absurd to say that though the creation of a mortgage or a lease could not give rise to a right of pre-emption under the Pre emption Act yet the assignment of those rights could give a right to pre-empt. Under the lease in question and according to general principles the lessee was not the owner of the trees. His rights qua the land and the trees were exactly the same, namely, of a temporary nature.

It has, however, been contended that the trees standing on the land came under the description of "things attached to the land" within the meaning of the General Clauses Act and as such were immoveable property and liable to pre emption, but the trees in this case cannot be said to be attached to the proprietary land. They are attached to the special tenure created in favour of the lessee. It is admitted that according to the terms of the lease the right of the lessee to the possession of the trees shall come to an end with the determination of his right to occupy the land.

For the reasons set forth in the judgment of my learned brother and for the additional reasons given above I would also accept the appeal and dismiss the plaintiff's suit.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The plaintiff sued for possession of the plaint property and that it might be restored to him by removing the defendant's building. The trial Court ordered the plaintiff to get possession on paying Rs. 2,000 to the defendant. The Appellate Judge reversed the decree of the lower Court and directed that the defendant should retain possession of the land covered by the building. The tenant has been in possession of the land for a considerable number of years, but it is admitted that he is not a permanent tenant under the documents which exist, nor can he claim to be a permanent tenant under section 83 of the Land Revenue Code. But the learned Appellate Judge considers that because he has been allowed without objection to build on a portion of the land, therefore, what were agricultural leases for a year had become building leases. I am afraid I cannot follow that argument. The ordinary rule is that a tenant must give up vacant possession at the end of his term. If he builds he builds at his own risk, and at the end of the term he can take away his building. If he leaves it there, it becomes the landlord's property.

Then it seems that the learned Appellate Judge has come to the conclusion that there was a sort of an estoppel which created a permanent tenancy as regards the portion of the land built upon. But that would be to ignore the real nature of an estoppel which prevents a party telling the truth, but it could not possibly create a permarent tenancy. All that we can say is that there is certainly an equity in this particular case on its own facts in favour of the plaintiff being bound to compensate the defendant if he gives notice. The defendant has been in possession. He also paid rent for this land for a very large number of years and has built to the knowledge of the plaintiff, as is admitted, one of the finest houses in Malvan, and we must say this, that very probably the defendant thought he would not be disturbed. But now the land has gone up in value, and the plaintiff evidently is not content with receiving the very small rent received by him on the terms on which he let it to the defendant, with the result that he has given notice. He gets a fine house under the decree of the trial Court, which probably is worth much more than Rs. 2,000 having regard to the increased prices. If we order the defendant to remove the house, it would probably be worth nothing as the materials would not fetch much when broken up. I think we ought to rely upon the discretion of the trial Court and hold that this was a case in which in equity the plaintiff ought to compensate the defendant for retaining his building. We allow the appeal and restore the decree of the trial Court. The plaintiff will get his costs throughout from the 1st defendant. The cross objections are dismissed with costs.

HEATON, J.—I agree to the decision proposed. The mistake made by the lower Appellate Court, I think was that it pferred something precise when it was logically impossible to infer anything but what was vague. No doubt it is quite logical to say that there must have been some sort of understanding between the landlord and the tenant, for the latter never would have put up such a costly building as he did, if he held only the position of an annual tenant. But when we come to the question what was it that was understood between the landlord and tenant, we find everything is vague. There is nothing in writing about it. No one deposes to it. It is all left to be inferred from general circumstances. It seems to me that you cannot, in a case like this, from general circumstances infer that which requires to be proved by definite evidence, such as for instance that there was a building lease, or that there was a specific understanding the terms of which can be stated. I think, therefore, that all that we can do is to say that although there is no specific agreement proved of the nature inferred by the lower Appellate Court, yet the circumstances do show that it would be very unjust to evict the defendant without awarding him compensation. Therefore, I think the order proposed by my Lord the Chief Justice is the correct order to make in this case.

ALLAHABAD HIGH COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 1097 OF 1917.

June 16, 1920.

Present:—Mr. Justice Sulaiman and Mr. Justice Gokul Prasad.

RAM SARUP AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—APPELLANTS

BAIJ NATH—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Contribution—Suit by several plaintiffs—Suit dismissed in default with costs—Costs realised from one plaintiff—Suit against co-plaintiffs for contribution, whether maintainable.

Where a bona fide suit is brought by several persons to substantiate a right which they honestly believe exists in them against the defendant and the suit is dismissed for default with costs, and the costs are recovered from one of the plaintiffs, a suit by him for contribution against the other plaintiffs is maintainable. [p. 325, col. 2.]

The rule regulating the enforcement of contribution as between co-defendants does not of necessity apply to the case of co-plaintiffs. [p. 326, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decree of the District Judge, Agra, modifying that of the Munsif.

Dr. Surendra Nath Sen, for the Appellants.

Mr. Narain Prasad Asthana, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The circumstances under which this appeal has arisen are briefly as follows:—The parties to the present suit put in an objection to the attachment of certain property attached in execution of a decree of one Ganga Sahai. The objection was disallowed and thereupon some of the parties to this suit and the predecessor-in title of others appointed two persons as special attorneys in order to institute a suit in the Bombay High Court against the aforesaid Ganga Sahai for a declaration that the property was not liable to attachment and sale in execution of the decree which Ganga Sahai had obtained against a third person. After certain evidence had been taken, this suit was dismissed for default of prosecution and the decree-holder defendant, Ganga Sahai, was awarded his costs against the parties to the present suit. He realised those costs from the plaintiff and the present suit, out of which this appeal has arisen, has been brought by the plaintiff for contribution against his co judgment debtors.

The pleas taken in defence were many. The defendants totally denied all knowledge of the Bombay suit and contended further that the plaintiff was wholly responsible for that litigation and that they were not liable to contribute. They further denied the plaintiff's right to claim a one-third share out of the costs.

The Court of first instance decreed the claim. The defendants went up in appeal and the learned District Judge has upheld the decree of the first Court, so far as the amount claimed for contribution was concerned, but has modified it in regard to a certain item payable on account of the stamp duty and penalty charged on one of the documents produced by the plaintiff in support of his claim. The defendants come here in second appeal.

The first point taken is that the parties to the former suit being joint tort feasors who knew or ought to have known that they were doing an illegal or wrongful act, no suit for contribution was legally maintainable. The second point is that the Courts below have erred in decreeing against the appellants any share of the additional stamp duty and penalty which the respondents paid in order to have a certain document admitted in evidence in furtherance of their own case. The way in which the argument on the first point has been pressed by Dr. Sen is that there is no right of contribution, because there was no special equity in favour of the plaintiffs which would entitle them to contribution. Second, that the claim brought in the Bombay Court was an unlawful claim, which was dismissed for default which was totally due to the plaintiff's fault, and, therefore, there was no equity in favour of the plaintiff. It will thus appear that the case as put forward in argument is slightly different from the one put forward in the grounds of appeal. It is quite clear that the present case is not that of joint tort-feasors. On the other hand, it seems to be a suit for contribution arising out of a decree for costs passed in a suit which the plaintiff and the defendants brought in the Bombay Court in exercise of a supposed bona fide right which they claimed in certain property. The property was money payable to one Paras Ram, who was a contractor in the Great Indian Peninsula Railway. He had assigned to the parties his right to recover certain money payable to him by the Company on account of contracts which he had undertaken to perform. The assignment was not recognised by the Great Indian Peninsula Railway, but nonetheless they recognised the then plaintiff's claim to this extent that before paying out the money to Paras Ram, their contractor, they used to give previous notice to the then plaintiffs of their intention to do so. The money which stood as payable to Paras Ram was attached by one of his creditors, namely, Ganga Sahai aforesaid, and after the failure of the objection of the parties to the present litigation in the execution department, they instituted the suit in the Bombay Court for a declaration of their right. That was a bona fide suit brought to substantiate a right which they honestly believed existed in them as against Paras Ram, so that the rule regarding joint tort feasors would not apply to the present case.

Coming, however, to the general question whether a suit for contribution between joint judgment-debtors would lie or not, it would depend more or less on the facts of the particular case. Prima facie the fact of a joint decree having been paid off by one of the judgment-debtors, would be some evidence that he had a right of contribution, but the defendant can always show that he, as between himself and the plaintiff, was not at all liable for the claim or was not liable equally to the plaintiff or that both being joint tort feasors, no contribution on public grounds should be enforced as between them, or for other reasons the suit could not be maintained. The cases which have been cited to us in support of the contention that no suit for contribution would lie at all, unless there was some special equity in favour of the plaintiff, are Mulla Singh v. Jagannath Singh (1), Suput Singh v. Imrit Tewari (2), Dearsly v. Middleweek (3). It has to be borne in mind that in all these cases the contribution was sought as between the defendants in the former suit, and no case has been cited to us in which there had been a suit for contribution as between plaintiffs, and which had been negatived on the same grounds. Obviously there would be a difference between a case of co-defendants and that of co plaintiffs. The defendants need not file a common defence. The plaintiffs, however, when they bring a suit, must sue on a common ground. Therefore, it does not follow of necessity that the rule which would regulate the enforcement of contribution as between co-defendants should be applied to the case of co-plaintiffs also. The case of Mulla Singh v. Jagannath Singh (1) is an example of a case in which the defence of the defendants was not the same. That case, therefore, would not be a guide for the decision of the present case. The case in Suput Singh v. Amrit Tewari (2), however, need be mentioned only in so far that it recognises the principle that where persons have acted under a bona fide claim of right, and had reason to suppose that they had a right to what they did, then they may have a right of contribution. In the present case, as would appear from the facts which we have stated above, the then plaintiffs were acting in the belief that they had a bona fide right to contest the attachment. It is further clear that they were all acting in concert for the benefit of all and that they were acting together through one set of attorneys. Each and every one of them had one and the same object and were acting in furtherance of it, and there was a mutuality of interest as amongst themselves. The defendants, whose main defence was based on the allegation that they knew nothing of this Bombay litigation, have failed to substantiate their allegations, and it cannot be denied that they took as much part in it as the plaintiff did. Their defence has failed altogether. They tried to prove one of the exceptions mentioned in the case of Siva Panda v. Jujusti Panda (4) and failed. Having regard to this we cannot but agree in holding that the present suit for contribution lies.

As regards the second point, under the stamp law all the executants were liable to pay the deficiency in stamp and the penalty, and having regard to the attitude taken up by the defendants in denying all the transactions regarding the Bombay suit, we do not think that the lower Appellate Court was wrong in making them liable for the proportionate amount of that sum. We think there is no force in this appeal and we, therefore, dismiss it with costs.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 1120 OF 1918.

THE DOHAD MUNICIPALITY—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 28, Sch. I, Art. 148A

PROMOTHA NATH v. SOURAV DASI.

—Bombay District Municipal Act (III of 1901), s. 122 —Verandah standing on public street for over thirty years—Municipality, whether entitled to remove verandah.

Where a verandah has been standing on a part of a public street for over thirty years, the site becomes the property of the person to whom the verandah belongs by the operation of section 28 and Article 146A of the First Schedule to the Limitation Act. In such a case the Municipality have no power to issue a notice under section 122 of the Bombay District Municipal Act for removal of the verandah.

Second appeal from the decision of the First Class Subordinate Judge, A. P., at Ahmedabad, in Appeal No. 336 of 1917, reversing that of the Subordinate Judge at Dohad, in Civil Suit No. 97 of 1916.

Mr. G. N. Thakor, for the Appellant.
Mr. M. N. Metha, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—This was a suit by the plaintiff for a declaration that the property mentioned in the plaint belonged to him, and for a permanent injunction restraining the defendant Municipality from removing the plaint verandah. The plaintiffs got a decree in the trial Court which was reversed on appeal, the learned Appellate Judge being of opinion that the case was governed by the decision in Dakore Town Municipality v. Anupram (1). We do not think that the decision of that case applies to the facts of this case, nor do we think that, however long a private person may have been in possession of a portion of a public street or road, the Municipality have still powers under section 122 of the Bombay District Municipal Act to direct him to give up possession, or to force him to gave up possession, of such part of the public street or road. In this case it has been proved as a fact, and it has been accepted as a fact in both Courts, that the verandah has been on the present site for more than thirty years. Assuming that it was originally built on a part of a public street or road, the Municipality is now barred from bringing a suit for recovering possession by virtue of Article 146A of the Indian Limitation Act and the result must follow under section 28 that the plaintiff has acquired a title to the land on which the verandah is built by over thirty years' possession. It is, therefore, no longer a part of the public street or road, and the Municipality have no jurisdiction over it because section 122 only refers to encroachments or obstructions in a public street, or obstructions or encroachments of the like nature in any open space not being private property. Once I find that this verandah is built on land which has ceased to be part of a public street or road and has become private property, it follows that the Municipality cannot issue a notice against the owner to remove it. The notice in this case, which is dated the 22nd December 1915, directs the appellant to remove the encroachment, but it does not mention the section under which the notice is given. I can only assume that it was issued under section 122. In my opinion the Municipality by their laches had lost all rights to the land covered by this verandah, and, therefore, they had no longer any power to issue notice under section 122 for the removal of the verandah. I think, therefore, the appeal succeeds and the decree of the trial Court must be restored with costs of the appeal here and in the lower Appellate Court.

HEATON, J.—I concur.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 66—

PROMOTHA NATH v. SOURAV DASI.

Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), s. 317—Execution sale—Purchaser under old Code, suit by, against transferee of certified purchaser, maintainability of—Sale-certificate, value of—Interpretation of Statutes—Retrospective operation, when not to be permitted—Vested rights, whether affected.

Under section 66 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1908 the title of the real purchaser of a property at a sale in execution of a decree cannot be enforced against the certified purchaser as also against persons who claim a title derived from the certified purchaser. Under section 317 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882, however, the real purchaser had a title enforceable against the whole world except the certified purchaser [p. 330, cols. 1 & 2.]

The wider restriction embodied by the Legislature in section 66 of the Code of 1908 cannot be applied to cases where the title of the real purchaser accrued under the Code of 1882 and was, at the time of its inception, subject only to the restriction contained in section 317 of that Code. Therefore, if the title of an execution-purchaser was perfected when section 317 of the Code of 1882 was in force, the real purchaser, notwithstanding the passing of the new Code of 1908, is entitled to maintain a suit against a transferee of the certified purchaser for a declaration that as the certified purchaser was not the real purchaser, his transferee has not acquired any title under his conveyance. [p. 330, col. 2.]

Every Statute which takes away or impairs a vested right acquired under existing laws or creates a new obligation or imposes a new duty or attaches a new disability, in respect of transactions or considerations already passed, must not be deemed retrospective in its operation The rule that enactments in a Statute are generally to be construed to be prospective and intended to regulate the future conduct of persons, is deeply founded in good sense and strict justice, and in the absence of clear words to that effect, a Statute will not be construed so as to take away a vested right of action acquired before it was passed. Appeal against the decree of Mr. Justice Teunon and Mr. Justice Greaves, dated the 4th of February 1919 and reported as 50 Ind. Cas. 335, in Appeal from Appellate Decree No. 2284 of 1916.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Samatul Chandra Dutt (with him Babu Manmatha Nath Pal), for the Appellant.—The plaintiff is the appellant. The appeal arises out of a suit for declaration of plaintiff's title by virtue of purchase at an execution sale held in 1903. The sale was confirmed in July 1906 and the sale certificate was taken out in 1909. The plaintiff's case is that he purchased the property in dispute in the name of his son, defendant No. 1, whose name appeared as the recorded purchaser. Subsequenly defendant contracted to sell the property to defendant No. 2 and a suit for specific performance thereof was decreed. In that suit the plaintiff not being a party, the present suit is brought. The question for decision is whether section 66 of the the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, is a bar to the suit. The suit was dismissed by the lower Court. On appeal to this Court there was a difference of opinion between Mr. Justice Teunon and Mr. Justice Greaves. Teunon, J., held that section 66 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, would not bar the present suit. Hence the present appeal. My point is that the sale having taken place in 1903 and confirmed in 1906, section 66 of the Code of 1908 does not apply. The old Code of 1882 was then in force and the case would be governed by sections 316 and 317 of the old Code. Reads sections 316 and 317 of the Code of 1882. The proviso of section 317 should be strictly construed. Refers to Dukhada Sundari Dasi v. Srimonto Jeardar (1). I submit the mere fact of the taking out of the sale certificate in 1909 would not place the purchaser under the wider restrictions of section 66 of the new Code of Civil Procedure of 1908, which was in force in 1909. The plaintiff's title accrued when the sale was confirmed in 1906. There is further nothing to show that the provisions of section 66 were retrospective in effect. In the absence of clear provision to that effect, a Statute cannot and ought not to be held to be retrospective in its effect. Refers to Tirumalaisami Naidu v. Subramaniam Chettiar (2), Budhu Kumar v. Hafiz Hussain (3), Gopeshwar Pal v. Jiban Chandra (4). Under the circumstances I would submit that the judgment of Teunon, J., takes the correct view of the law and ought to be upheld.

Babu Mohendranath Ray (with him Babu Rupendranath Mitter), for the Respondent:—

(1) 26 C. 950; 3 C. W. N. 657; 18 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 1208.
(2) 45 Ind. Cas. 109; 40 M. 1009.
(3) 20 Ind. Cas. 821; 18 C. L. J. 274.
(4) 24 Ind. Cas. 37; 41 C. 1125; 19 C. L. J. 549; 18 C. W. N. 804.

There is one matter which I should like to place before your Lordships first. The appellant died and he was substituted by some one. An issue was raised as to the competency of the original plaintiff to bring the suit which has been dismissed. Since then the plaintiff has died and he has been substituted by his next shebait. Evidence was taken on the point but the suit was dismissed by the first Court on the merits. The lower Appellate Court and the Division Bench of this Court having disagreed, the suit was dismissed.

I will now turn to the other point raised by the other side. Reads section 317 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882 and section 66 of the Code of 1908. According to the rulings a certified purchaser did not include an assignee of the purchaser under section 317 of the old Code. Section 66 removes this limited application of section 317 and bars a suit not only against a certified purchaser but also against his assignee. Section 317 puts a restriction upon a right of action based upon right of property. Section 66 widens the sphere of that restriction. When a Statute provides for taking away right of action against a certain class of persons, can it not be said that it would be applicable to a certain class of persons when the Act is passed? Section 66 ought not to have any retrospective effect, but is this giving retrospective effect? I submit not. On principle it should be held that section 66 would bar the suit.

Babu Samatul Chandra Dutt replied briefly.

JUDGMENT.

MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—This is an appeal under clause 15 of the Letters Patent in an appeal from an appellate decree, wherein the two Judges of the Division Court have been equally divided in opinion upon an important question of law, namely, whether the rule embodied in section 66 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, is applicable to an execution purchaser whose title was perfected when section 317 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1882, was in force.

The plaintiff instituted this suit for a declaration of his title by purchase at an execution sale held on the 11th August 1903. His case is that he purchased the property in the name of his son, who is the first defendant in this litigation. The sale was confirmed under sections 314 and 316 of the Code of 1882 on the 30th July 1906. The sale certificate, however, was not taken out till the 24th April 1909 but the title of the purchaser accrued, under section 316, from the date of the confirmation of the sale, that is, from the 30th July 1906, which must be taken to be the date of the sale certificate. This sale certificate sets out the name of the recorded purchaser as the purchaser of the property. The first defendant, the recorded purchaser, appears to have subsequently contracted to sell the property to the second defendant, with the consequence that in a litigation between the two defendants the second defendant obtained a decree for a conveyance by the first defendant, in his favour. As the plaintiff was not made a party to that suit, he now seeks a declaration that the first defendant was not the real purchaser and that the second defendant has not acquired any title to the disputed property under his conveyance. The suit has been dismissed on the ground that it is barred under the provisions of section 66 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1908.

The plaintiff now contends that section 66 of the Code of 1908 has no application, and that the rights of the parties are governed by section 317 of the Code of 1882, which was in force at the time when the execution sale took place and was confirmed. The sale certificate, as we have already pointed out, was granted on the 24th April 1909 after the Code of 1908 had come into force, but it has not been contended, and, in our opinion, it could not be seriously contended, that the delay in the issue of the certificate could in any way affect the position of the parties. A sale certificate, it is well established, does not create title, but is merely evidence of title. Tantardhari Sing v. Sundar Lal Missir (5) and Braja Noth Pal v. Joggeswar Bagchi (6).

The sale, which is the root of the alleged title of the plaintiff, took place when the Code of 1882 was in force. Section 316 of that Code provides as follows: 'When a sale of immoveable property has become absolute in manner aforesaid (that is, as provided in section 314), the Court shall grant a certificate stating the property sold and the name of the person who at the time of sale is declared to be the purchaser. Such certificate shall bear the date of the confirmation of the sale; and, so far as regards the parties to the suit and persons claiming through or under them, the title to the property sold shall vest in the purchaser from the date of such certificate and not before, provided that the decree under which the sale took place was still subsisting at that date."

(5) 7 C. L. J. 384.
(6) 1 Ind. Cas. 62; 9 C. L. J. 346.

Under this provision, the title of the purchaser became absolute on the date of the confirmation of the sale, that is, on the 30th July 1906. That title, however, was subject to the limitation embodied in section 317, which provides as follows:— "No suit shall be maintained against the certified purchaser on the ground that the purchase was made on behalf of any other person, or on behalf of some one through whom such other person claims." Consequently, the title acquired could not be enforced against the certified purchaser on the ground that he was not the real purchaser. We must bear in mind in this connection that it had been held by this Court in the case of Dukhada Sundari Dasi v. Srimonto Joardar (1) that section 317, which imposes a restriction upon the right of the owner to enforce his title, should be strictly construed, and that, consequently, such title could be enforced against an assignee of the certified purchaser, though not against the certified purchaser himself. The same view was adopted in the cases of Theyyavelan v. Kochan (7) and Sibta Kunwar v. Bhagoli (8). The position, then, is clear that at the time when the plaintiff acquired his title by purchase at the execution sale, he was subject to the restriction embodied in section 317, that is, he had a title enforceable against the whole world except the certified purchaser. When, however, the Code of 1908 came into force on the 1st January 1909, section 317 of the Code of 1882 was replaced by section 66 of the new Code which introduced a restriction of a much wider scope. Sub section (1) of section 66 is in these terms: "No suit shall be maintained against any person claiming title under a purchase certified by the Court in such manner as may be prescribed, on the ground that the purchase was made on behalf of the plaintiff or on behalf of some one through whom the plaintiff claims." Consequently, under the new Code, the title of the real owner cannot be enforced against the certified purchaser as also against persons who claim a title derived from the certified purchaser. The question thus arises, whether in these circumstances, the wider restriction embodied by the Legislature in section 66 of the Code of 1908 can be applied to cases where the title accrued under the Code of 1882, and was, at the time of its inception, subject only to the restriction contained in section 317 of that Code. In our opinion, the answer must be in the negative.

It is manifest that the respondent seeks to read into the Code of 1882 section 66 of the Code of 1908, or in other words, to give retrospective operation to the latter provision of the law. This contention is opposed to well recogised canons for the interpretation of Statutes. As was observed in Munjhoori Bibi v. Akel Mahmud (9), every Statute which takes away or impairs a vested right acquired under existing laws or creates a new obligation or imposes a new duty or attaches a new disability, in respect of transactions or considerations already passed, must not be deemed retrospective in its operation. The rule that enactments in a Statute are generally to be construed to be prospective and intended to regulate the future conduct of persons, is deeply founded in good sense and strict justice, and it has been repeatedly laid down that in the absence of clear words to that effect, a Statute will not be construed so as to take away a vested right of action acquired before it was passed. Budhu Kumar v. Hafiz Hussain (3) and Gopeshwar Pal v. Jiban Chandra (4). But the respondent has argued that section 66 of the Code of 1918, like section 317 of the Code of 1882, embodies merely a rule of procedure, and that as no litigant has a vested interest in the course of procedure, the new Statute does not in fact take away a vested right. In our opinion, this contention is based upon a narrow and superficial view of the true effect of section

(7) 21 M. 7; 7 M. L. J. 290; 7 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 361.

66 of the Code of 1908 and section 317 of the Code of 1882. Each of these provisions no doubt finds a place in a code of procedure, but each imposes in essence a serious restriction upon the title of the real purchaser at the execution sale. As has been well observed, of things that do not appear and things that do not exist, the reckoning in a Court of law is the same, a title which cannot be proved against an opponent in the eye of law has in point of fact no existence in relation to that individual. It is consequently indisputable that both section 317 of the Code of 1882 and section 66 of the Code af 1908 operate to place a limitation upon the title of the purchaser, with this difference that the effect of section 66 is to widen the fetter placed upon the title of the purchaser by section 317. If we look at the matter from a different standpoint, the effect of section 66 is to improve the position of the certified purchaser, and in effect to confer upon him a power of alienation he would not otherwise enjoy. If the certified purchaser alienated the property, the result notwithstanding section 317 would be that the title of the alienee could be forthwith defeated by the real owner. Under section 66, on the other hand, the certified purchaser is enabled to confer a good title on the transferee, because the real owner is debarred from impeaching the title not only of the certified purchaser but also of the person who has derived title from him. In our opinion, there can be no doubt that the view taken by Mr. Justice Teunon is correct and that the decree made by the District Judge cannot be upheld.

The result is that this appeal is allowed, the decree made by the District Judge set aside and the case remitted to the Court of first instance to be tried on the merits on fresh evidence to be adduced by both parties.

A question has been raised as to whether the person who obtained leave to prosecute the appeal after the death of the original plaintiff is really competent to do so. That question will be left open for consideration by the trial Court. The counter affidavit which has been filed here will be transmitted to the Court below as part of the record.

The appellant is entitled to his costs of this appeal, of the appeal before the Division Bench and also before the District Judge. The costs in the Court of first instance will abide the result of the retrial.

FLETCHER, J.—I agree.

RICHARDSON, J.—I also agree.

Appeal allowed;

Pensions Act (XXIII of 1871), ss. 4, 6—Inam, construction of—Grant of village to continue in grantee's family—Suit relating to grant—Certificate, whether necessary—Jurisdiction of Civil Court.

Where the decision of the Inam Commissioner was that a village, excluding the ancient hakdars and inamdars, should be continued as inam in the grantees' family so long as their male descendants were alive, the order should be construed as adjudging the lands and not merely the revenues of the village to the grantees, and a certificate under section 6 of the Pensions Act is not necessary in order to enable a Civil Court to entertain a suit relating to such grant [p. 333, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Ahmednager, in Appeal No. 79 of 1916, reversing the decree passed by the Second Class Subordinate Judge, Shevgaon, in Civil Suit No. 323 of 9.1.

Mr. G. S. Rao, for the Appellants.

Mr. Coyajee (with him Mr. J. G. Rele), for Respondents Nos. 1 and 3.

JUDGMENT.

M. CLEOD, C. J.—The plaintiff brought this suit praying that it might be declared that plaintiffs Nos. 1 and 2 had a 1 anna 4-pies share in the Jahagir village of Kanoshi, and that it might be declared that they were entitled to receive Rs. 65, or any greater or less amount which might be settled according to Tharavband, from the village officers by a separate receipt, and for an injunction and for other relief.

Before the Subordinate Judge a preliminary issue was framed: Is a certificate under the Pensions Act necessary? The learned Judge held that it was necessary and as the certificate was not produced, the plaintiff's suit was dismissed on the 29th November 1913. In appeal the decree was set aside, and the suit was remanded to the trial Court for a framing and trial on evidence of the issue whether the grant to the parties' ancestors was of the soil or of the land revenue. The finding on that issue was that the grant in suit was of the soil, and not of the land revenue only, and that a certificate under the Pensions Act was not necessary. A decree was passed on the 29th February 1916 in favour of the plaintiff awarding him the greater part of his claim. In first appeal the learned District Judge held that a certificate was necessary. He said that the plaintiff's claim in this case was limited to a share in the nett land revenue of an inam village as ascertained from the Tharavband and to a corresponding claim for arrears. The learned Judge seems to have overlooked the fact that the plaintiffs claimed a declaration that they were sharers to the extent of 1 anna 4 pies in the Jahagir village, and that the plaint was not confined to a mere request for a declaration that they were entitled to receive a share of the revenue from the village officers and nothing more. The learned Judge has not dealt with the question whether there was originally a grant of the soil of the village, and not merely a grant of the royal share of the revenue. The trial Judge has found that this question must be decided wholly on the decision of the Inam Commissioner, copy of which has been filed and was finally marked Exhibit 82. That was a decision by the Inam Commissioner under rule 1 of Schedule B of Act XI of 1852. The finding was that the village of Mouje Kanoshi, Taluka Shevgaon, District Nagar, excluding the ancient hakdars and inamdars, should be continued as inam to Pir Durga Shaha Sharifa so long as the male descendants of any one of the three persons, namely, Babamiya valad Mahomed Burhan, Matumiya valad Baba Sahib and Mahomed Miya valad Darvesh were alive. We have been referred to the decision in Vasudev Pandit v. Collector of Puna (1) and that case is almost exactly on all fours with this case. The learned Judges said: "If we felt ourselves free to dispose of the case on a construction of these documents (that is to say, the grants made to Bhau Maharaj by Sir T. Munro in 1818, confirmed by the Honourable Mount-Stuart Elphinstone), we should have considerable difficulty in saying that they were meant to convey more than the revenue arising from the village. But the disposal of the present case is to be governed by wholly different considerations—considerations which we cannot but think would have had a decisive effect in the District Court, had they been duly pressed upon the attention of the Judge presiding there. The rights of the inamdar have been weighed and adjudicated on by the Inam Commissioner under Act XI of 1852. The duty of that officer, as laid in rule 1 of Schedule A to the Act, 'is to investigate...the titles of persons holding or claiming against Government the possession or enjoyment of an Inam or Jahagir, or, any interest therein, or claiming exemption from the payment of land revenue.' According to section 7 of the Act 'no decision or order of the Inam Commissioner...shall be questioned or avoided in any Court of law."

The judgment of the Inam Commissioner in that case was in exactly similar terms as the decision in this case, except that additional words baki darobast gav chalvava were used in that case which are translated by the learned Judge "let the whole remainder of the village continue" (in the enjoyment or possession of the inamdar's family). But otherwise the decision of the Inam Commissioner was that the village, excluding the ancient hakdars and inamdars, should be continued as Inam in the grantees' family so long as their male descedants were alive, and the learned Judges came to the conclusion that that was more than a grant of the revenue. When, therefore, with express reference to a rule applicable only to lands, he says that, saving particular charges, the whole village is to go on, or for the future to be in the possession or enjoyment of the inamdar's family, we must necessarily construe this order as adjudging the lands and not merely the revenues of the village to the claimant. I think this case must be decided according to the decision in Vasudev Pandit v. Collector of Puna (1) and that, therefore, no certificate was necessary under section 4 of the Pensions Act. The result must be that the decision of the learned District Judge must be set aside, and the case must be remanded to him for trial on the merits. The appellant will have the cost of the appeal and the costs in the lower Appellate Court.

HEATON, J.—We are only at present concerned with the question whether a certificate under the Pensions Act is necessary. According to the practice and rulings of this Court, if there is a grant of the royal share of the revenue, and nothing more, and a claim arises in relation to that grant, the claim cannot be heard by a Civil Court without a certificate, for so it is provided by section 4 of the Pensions Act. But if there is a grant of something other than merely the royal share of the revenue, or at any rate, if there is a grant of the village as a holding or estate, then a certificate under the Pensions Act is not necessary. I use the expression "the grant of a village as a holding or estate," in preference to the words commonly used "the grant of the soil," because they seem to me to express more accurately and more consonantly with the usage in this part of India what is actually conferred. A great many grants now called inam were really grants of villages in management, and I think the idea of a grant of the management is far more prevalent here in Western India, than is the English idea of an absolute grant of the soil. But, however that may be, we clearly have in this case something much more than a mere grant of the royal share of the revenue. That, I think, is apparent from the words in Exhibit 82 by themselves. When we refer to the case of Vasudev Pandit v. Collector of Puna (1), I think we find authority for saying that a decision in a case of this kind (where a village is held for many years by Wahiwatdars), that the village is to be continued, indicates a grant of something very much in excess of the royal share of the revenue. It seems to me, therefore, that in this case a certificate under the Pensions Act is not necessary and that the appeal must, as proposed, be remanded to be decided on the merits.

Decree set aside;
Case remanded.

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Ambala, dated the 13th March 1916, modifying that of the Subordinate Judge, Ambala, dated the 30th June 1914.

Mr. Sundar Das, for the Appellant,

AMIR BEGAM v. HUSSAIN BIBI.

Lala Moti Sagar, R. S. and Mr. M. L. Puri, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Abdul Kadir, who died many years ago, left a widow Musammat Hussain Bibi and two daughters, Musammat Amir Begum plaintiff and Musammat Habib-ul-Nisa defendant No. 1. On 14th June 1904 the widow executed a deed of gift by which she gave 2,498 bighas and 10 biswas of land and a house to her daughter Musammat Habib-ul-Nisa. On the 30th January 1905 Musammat Amir Begam is said to have executed a deed of release in which she consented to the gift and gave up her rights to the property gifted. The Courts below have held that the parties are governed by custom and that Musammat Amir Begam has a locus standi to maintain a suit for a declaration that the gift shall not effect her rights. The first Court gave her a decree as regards both the land and the house. The lower Appellate Court held that the suit as regards the house was barred by time under Article 120 of the Indian Limitation Act but maintained the decree in regard to the land. Both parties have appealed, Musammat Habib ul Nisa asking for the dismissal of the suit and Musammat Amir Begam asking for a decree in reference to the house as well as the land.

The first point raised by Mr. Moti Sagar on behalf of the defendant-appellant was that his client objected to the suit both on the ground that the parties were governed by Muhammadan Law and also that even if they were governed by custom, the plaintiff being a female had no locus standi to maintain a suit of this nature. He urged that though the trial Court discussed the evidence and came to a considered finding that the plaintiff had a locus standi, the lower Appellate Court did not come to any finding at all. He, therefore, urged that we should remand the case in order that that Court might, after considering the evidence, come to a finding. Now, the lower Appellate Court says in its judgment: "All the rulings possibly relevant have been exhaustively discussed by the lower Court, and it will be sufficient to say that I agree with its finding that Musammat Hussain Bibi had no right to make the gift to her daughter Habib-ul-Nisa to the detriment of the plaintiff Amir Begam, and the latter can claim to have the gift set aside so far as it affects her rights." This sentence shows that the lower Appellate Court did come to a clear finding that the plaintiff had a locus standi to sue to have the gift set aside. It is true that it has not discussed the rulings, but it was not necessary for it to do this when it agreed with the conclusion of the trial Court. This decision of the lower Court is upon a question of custom, and we hold that the point cannot be raised in second appeal in the absence of a certificate.

The next question is as to the admissibility of the so-called deed of release. This deed was a registered one, but the lower Appellate Court held that it was inadmissible in evidence owing to defect in registration as the person presenting it on behalf of Musammat Amir Begam had no proper power of-attorney; and it was of opinion that even though Musammat Amir Begam was examined on commission and said that she had executed the deed and agreed to its registration, the defect in presentation was fatal. In support of this proposition the Court referred to Jambu Parshad v. Muhammad Nawab Aftab Ali (1), where it was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council that "sections 32 and 33 of the Registration Act, relating to the presentation of documents for registration, are imperative, and their provisions must be strictly followed, and where it was proved that agents who presented deeds of mortgage for registration had not been duly authorised in the manner prescribed by the Act to present them, the deeds were held not to be validly registered, so as (under section 49) to affect immoveable property or to be received in evidence of any transactions affecting such property." It was further held that "A Registrar or Sub-Registrar has no jurisdiction to register a document unless he is moved to do so by a person who has executed or claims under it or by the representative or assign of such person, or by an agent of such person, representative or assign duly authorised by a power-of-attorney executed and authenticated in the manner prescribed by section 33 of the Act." Their Lordships pointed out that "One object of sections 32 to 35 of the Registration Act was to make it difficult for persons to commit fraud by means of registration under the Act; and that it is the duty of the Courts in India not to allow the imperative provisions of the Act to be defeated."

Now, in the present case it is admitted that the deed was not presented for registration either by Musammat Amir Begam herself or by an agent duly authorised in the manner prescribed by section 33 of the Registration Act. Mr. Moti Sagar urges that the Privy Council, when they gave that ruling, did not consider the provisions of section 60 of the Registration Act as to the operation of the certificate of registration endorsed on a deed. In our opinion section 60 does not help Mr. Moti Sagar's client in a case like the present, where we find that the registering officer had, as laid down by the Privy Council, no jurisdiction to register the deed which was not presented to the Court in accordance with the provisions of the Act. We, therefore, agree with the lower Appellate Court that the deed of release was inadmissible in evidence.

Mr. Moti Sagar then wished to show as by other circumstances that Musammat Amir Begam had acquiesced in the gift; but we find that this point was never raised in the lower Appellate Court. There were numerous grounds of appeal in that Court, but the only ground which touched on the question of acquiescence was No. 10, which said that the plaintiff could not bring a suit to contest the gift so long as the deed of release was in existence, in other words, it urged that she was estopped by the execution of the deed of release and not in any other way. We, therefore, declined to hear arguments on the question whether the plaintiff's acquiescence in the gift was proved apart from the deed of release. On this finding the defendant's appeal must fail.

We now come to the plaintiff's appeal. The lower Appellate Court, relying upon Dev Raj v. Shiv Ram (2), held that a suit for a declaration that a mortgage of a house shall not affect the reversionary rights of the plaintiff is governed by Article 120, and not by Article 125 of the Limitation Act which refers only to suits for a declaration relating to alienations of land, a house not being land. Now in Dev Raj v. Shiv Ram (2) it was no doubt held that a house was not land within the meaning of Article 125, but no reasons are given in that judgment for this decision, and it is not apparent from the report whether the house was sold apart from its site. This was pointed out by a single Judge of this Court in Soman Singh v. Uttam Chand (3). Moreover, in Dev Raj v. Shiv Ram (2) there was no necessity to decide this particular point, because the plaintiff was not the first reversioner and would not, in the terms of the Article, have, therefore, been entitled to the possession of the land but for such alienation. In Ralya Ram v. Sher Singh (4) (an unreported judgment of the Chief Court in Civil Appeal No. 2878 of 1906), it was held that Article 125 applied when a house including the site was sold. In the present case the house sold is in the town of Sadhaura, and the presumption is that the owner of the house is owner of the site also and that in the absence of anything to the contrary in the deed of gift the house and the site together were gifted. We, therefore hold that Article 125 of the Limitation Act applies to the suit so far as it relates to the house also.

We accordingly dismiss defendant's appeal and accepting that of the plaintiff, restore the decree of the first Court to the effect that the deed of gift dated the 14th June 1904 shall not affect the plaintiff's reversionary rights in the property gifted after the death of the donor with costs in all Courts.

BOMBAY HIGH COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 1045 of 1918.

January 29, 1920.

BHAGWAN BHAU v. KRISHNAJI GANOJI.

The second illustration to clause (c) of section 27 of the Specific Relief Act must be taken to refer, not merely to joint tenants in the English sense, but to co-parceners in a joint Hindu family.

Therefore, where the father of a joint Hindu family contracts to sell his share in the family property and dies, the purchaser might enforce specific performance of the contract against the sons of the vendor.

Appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Ratnagiri, in Appeal No. 39 of 1918, reversing the decree passed by the Second Class Subordinate Judge at Devgad, in Civil Suit No. 131 of 1917.

Mr. B. V. Desai, for the Appellants.

Mr. S. R. Parulekar for Mr. A. G. Desai, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The plaintiff sued to obtain specific performance of an agreement to sell the plaint property passed between him and one Bhau Indap, dated the 7th July 1916. The plaintiff had paid Rs. 20 to Bhau, the contract clearly being a contract for sale to the plaintiff of Bhau's interest, which was three pies in the joint family property. Before the sale could be completed Bhau died, and the suit is brought against his sons for specific performance. The 3rd defendant paid Rs. 20 into Court, the sum which had been paid to his father, and the trial Court directed that the plaintiff should receive that amount, and his claim for specific performance was refused. In the lower Appellate Court this decree was reversed, and the plaintiff's suit was decreed. The respondent relies on section 27 of the Specific Relief Act, clause (c), 2nd illustration to that clause. It is difficult at first sight to see how that illustration fits in with clause (c). I think the argument is this, that if A and B are joint tenants of joint family property, A has the expectation of succeeding on the death of B to the whole, and A, therefore, may be said, though somewhat inaccurately, to have a title to that undivided moiety, although that title, whatever it may be called, is liable to be displaced by B. That seems to be the argument, although it is not perfectly clear how B can displace A's title, for the only thing that could happen to prevent A succeeding to B's half would be the event of A dying before B. In that way it may be said that B would be displacing A's title. However that may be, the illustration distinctly covers the case of one joint tenant agreeing to sell his undivided moiety, and then dying, for it states that his purchaser could bring a suit for specific performance against the survivor, and unless we place co-parceners in a joint Hindu faimly in a different category to joint tenants, we should have to hold that the illustration is binding upon us. The illustration itself is perfectly clear. There is no ambiguity about it, and there is no reason why we should not follow it in the case of all joint tenants, whether members of a joint Hindu family or not. If we did not do so, a certain amount of uncertainty would arise in future, and it is always desirable to avoid that. In my opinion, therefore, the decision of the lower Appellate Court must be upheld and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

HEATON, J.—I think the 2nd illustration to clause (c) of section 27 of the Specific Relief Act must be taken to refer, not merely to joint tenants in the English sense, but to co-parceners in a joint Hindu family. I think so, because the Specific Relief Act is applicable to India and enacted for India, where the majority of the population are Hindus and throughout the whole of which country the idea of a joint Hindu family is well understood. But I rather regret that it is so for this reason: we have to decree specific performance and what will be the result? The result will be that the plaintiff will obtain a transfer to himself of a 3 pies share in a certain property. He will have no right to joint enjoyment of that property and he will be unable to obtain separate possession of it without bringing a suit for partition. So that we are giving the plaintiff a decree which at best, in all human probability, will only lead to further disagreement and further litigation. That is not the kind of case in which I personally should be disposed to decree specific performance. But the Legislature have thought otherwise, and after all our own personal views are nothing, the intentions of the Legislature everything. I think, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 328 OF 1920.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 145—Previous proceedings under section—Order not challenged in Civil Court—Fresh proceedings in respect of same property, whether legal.

When a party has been declared to be in possession as a result of proceedings under section 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code, fresh proceedings under that section cannot be started against him, unless it can be shown that the order has been either vacated in due course of law or possession has been surrendered amicably. If a Magistrate starts such proceedings, he acts without jurisdiction and his order is liable to be set aside. [p. 337, col. 2.]

Where, therefore, a Magistrate in drawing up a proceeding under section 145 included therein a piece of property of which, in a previous proceeding under that section, possession had already been declared, and no steps had been taken to challenge that order in the Civil Courts:

Held, that in respect of that piece of property the Magistrate had acted without jurisdiction. [p. 337, col. 2.]

Messrs. Hasan Imam, H. L. Nandkeolyar and G. C. Pal, for the Petitioners.

Messrs. K. B. Dutt, Murari Prasad and B. N. Mitter, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application to set aside an order passed in proceedings under section 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code against the petitioner, the second party therein, in respect of a plot of 78 bighas of land. The Deputy Magistrate, after making inquiry, decided that the first party were in possession of the whole of the disputed land.

The point now taken before me by Mr. Hasan Imam is that the Magistrate failed to notice that in 1918 there were proceedings under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, wherein 15 bighas out of this plot of 78 were found to be in possession of the first party in that case, one of whom, Krishna Kant Jha, is nephew of Bajit Lal, who is a member of the second party in the present proceedings. In the judgment the learned Magistrate has made reference to the judgment in a case under section 380 of the Indian Penal Code, in which it was held that Bajit Lal was not in possession of the land. He proceeds to state that since this judgment in section 380 case was passed, nothing has transpired to indicate that Bajit Lal has come into possession of the land.

It is urged that a decision as to possession having been come to in 1918 in a case under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, and no steps having been taken by the party then found so to be out of possession in the Civil Court, the Magistrate was bound to uphold the order under section 145 and had no jurisdiction to again enquire into the possession of that portion of the plot. Mr. Hasan Imam relies on a judgment of this Court in the case of Krishna Deyal Gir v. Sheikh Nirmali (1). There Mullick, J., held that when a party has been declared to be in possession as a result of proceedings under section 145, fresh proceedings under the same section cannot be started against him, unless it can be shown that the order has been either vacated in due course of law or possession has been surrendered amicably. If a Magistrate starts such fresh proceedings, he acts without jurisdiction and his order is liable to be set aside.

There is no doubt that in the proceedings in 1918 Krishna Jha, the nephew of Bajit Lal, was declared to be in possession and in view of the ruling I have just cited, the Magistrate, who passed the order in the present proceedings, had no jurisdiction to include in it the 15 bighas, of which possession had already been declared. No steps have been taken so far to challenge in the Civil Courts the order passed in 1918.

So far, then, I must hold that the Magistrate acted without jurisdiction, but it is contended that his order having been shown to be without jurisdiction in respect of this portion of the property in dispute, the order as to the whole property must be set aside. In this I cannot agree. The Magistrate had jurisdiction to draw up proceedings in respect of the whole property, which gave rise to a likelihood of a breach of the peace, and his duty was to find who was in possession. He found possession as to the plot, but it must be held he had no jurisdiction to come to a finding contrary to the previous order owing to his not having taken into account the decision in the previous 145 proceedings.

SANDERSON, C. J.—This was a Rule obtained by Khandkar Hedayatulla calling upon the Deputy Commissioner to show cause why the proceedings complained of should not be quashed. The proceedings are referred to in paragraphs 10 and 11 of the petition. They are under the Assam Forest Regulation, VII of 1891.

It appears that on the 27th of September 1919 a forester submitted a report to the Divisional Forest Officer, Sylhet Division, charging the petitioner and 11 others with having committed offences under the said Regulation, VII of 1891, by cutting a fari, settling tenants and otherwise acting in contravention of the provisions of the said Regulation in respect of lands of the reserved forest. Thereupon, summonses were issued upon the petitioner and the 11 others, calling upon them to answer a charge under section 25 of the said Regulation. These are the proceedings in respect of which the Rule was granted.

The main ground upon which the Rule was supported was that a notification, which was issued by the Chief Commissioner of Assam and which was to the effect that certain lands therein specified were a reserved forest; was invalid. The ground upon which it was urged to be invalid was that the petitioner had submitted a claim to the Forest Settlement Officer in respect of certain lands, claiming that he owned and possessed such lands as the proprietor of a permanently settled estate, that such lands were not at the disposal of the Government and that the Government had no right to constitute the said lands as part of the reserved forest, and, further that the petitioner's claim had not been disposed of. Reliance was placed upon section 17 of the Regulation which provides as follows: "(1) When the following events have occurred, namely:—

"(a) the period fixed under section 6 for preferring claims has elapsed, and all claims, if any, made within such period have been disposed of by the Forest Settlement Officer, and (b) if such claims have been made, the period fixed by section 15 for appealing from the orders passed on such claims has elapsed, and all appeals, if any, presented within such period have been disposed of by the appellate officer, and (c) (which I need not read in detail), the Local Government may publish a notification in the Official Gazette specifying the limits of the forest which it is intended to reserve, and declaring the same to be reserved from a date fixed by such notification. (2) From the date so fixed such forest shall be deemed to be a reserved forest."

It was urged that all the events which are mentioned in section 17 must have occurred before the notification can be legally published, and it was urged that inasmuch as the petitioner had made a claim and inasmuch as that claim had not been diposed of by the Forest Settlement Officer, the notification was invalid.

The facts which to my mind are necessary for the purpose of my judgment are as follows: Mr. Sankey was appointed the Forest Settlement Officer and a claim was submitted by the petitioner on the 23rd of April 1916. It was called an "objection under section 6 of the Assam Forest Regulation, VII of 1891:" although it was called an objection, it was in reality a claim and it was treated as a claim by both sides during the argument of this Rule. I need not read it. I have already referred to the material facts relied on in that claim. I may perhaps read the 15th clause (the last clause) which runs as follows: "That under the aforesaid and other circumstances the objectors humbly submit that the Government has no right to constitute the lands of schedule 2 or any part thereof a reserved forest and pray that your Honour may be pleased to exclude so much of the lands of Schedule 2 as lie within the boundaries mentioned in the above notification from the operation thereof." On the 16th of May 1916, the matter came before Mr. Sankey, and Mr. Sankey made the following order: "This is an objection to the reservation of certain land as reserved forest in the Langla Patharia Hills on the ground that the land in question belongs to the permanently settled estates of objectors and is, therefore, not at the disposal of Government. I am of opinion that as Forest Settlement Officer I am not empowered to decide an objection which denies the title of Government. The learned Pleader who appears on behalf of objectors is of the same opinion and informs me that he puts in this objection and offers to produce oral and documentary evidence as a safeguard to his client in any future proceeding before the Civil Courts. I came to the same decision last year in similar cases having reference to the reservation proceedings in the Patharia Hills and my decision was upheld on appeal by the Commissioner. Under these circumstances I consider it unnecessary to argue the matter. I disallow the objection." The notification of the lands as a reserved forest was made on the 29th of August 1917. The report of the Forest Officer to which I have already referred was made on the 27th of September 1919, and then the summonses, the basis of the proceedings in question, were issued.

In my judgment it is necessary to refer to some sections of the Assam Forest Regulation. They are:—

"4. The Local Government may constitute any land at the disposal of the Government a reserved forest in manner hereinafter provided.

"5. (1) Whenever it is proposed to constitute any land a reserved forest, the Local Government shall publish a notification in the Official Gazette (a) specifying as nearly as possible the situation and limits of such land, (b) declaring that it is proposed to constitute such land a reserved forest, and (c) appointing an officer (hereinafter called the Forest Settlement Officer) to inquire into and determine the existence, nature and extent of any rights claimed by, or alleged to exist in favour of, any person in or over any land comprised within such limits, and any claims relating to the practice within such limits of Jhum-cultivation, and to deal with the same as provided in this chapter.

"(2) The Forest Settlement Officer shall ordinarily be a person other than a Forest Officer, but a Forest Officer may be appointed by the Local Government to assist the Forest Settlement Officer in the inquiry prescribed by this chapter.

"6. When a notification has been published under section 5, the Forest Settlement Officer shall publish in the language of the country, at the headquarters of each district and sub-division in which any portion of the land comprised in such notification is situate, and in every town and village in the neighbourhood of such land, a proclamation—(a) specifying as nearly as possible the situation and limits of the proposed forest, (b) setting forth the substance of the provisions of the next following section, (c) explaining the consequences which, as hereinafter provided, will ensue on the reservation of such forest, and (d) fixing a period of not less than three months from the date of the publication of such proclamation and requiring every person claiming any right or making any claim referred to or mentioned in section 5 either to present to such officer within such period a written notice specifying, or to appear before him within such period and state, the nature of such right or claim."

"11. (1) In the case of a claim to a right in or over any land other than the following rights, namely:—(a) a right of way, (b) a right to a water course or to use of water, (c) a right of pasture or to forest produce, the Forest Settlement Officer shall pass an order specifying the particulars of such claim and admitting or rejecting the same wholly or in part....."

The learned Vakil who supported this Rule submitted that the claim which was made by the petitioner in this case ought to have been dealt with by the Forest Settlement Officer, Mr. Sankey, under the provisions of section 11.

"15. Any person who has made a claim under this chapter may, within three months from the date of any order passed on such claim by the Forest Settlement Officer under sections 11, 12, 13 or 14, present an appeal from such order to such officer of the Revenue Department of rank, not lower than that of a Deputy Commissioner, as the Local Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, appoint by name, or as holding an office, to hear appeals from such orders."

"16. (1) Every appeal under the last foregoing section shall be made by petition in writing, and may be delivered to the Forest Settlement Officer, who shall forward it without delay to the officer competent to hear the same.

"(2) Every such appeal shall be heard in the manner prescribed for the time being for the hearing of appeals in matters relating to revenue, and, except as hereinafter provided, the order passed on the appeal shall be final."

Section 17.—I have already read section 17 which provides for notification declaring a forest to be reserved.

"20. The Local Government may, within five years from the publication of any notification under section 17 revise any arrangement made under section 13 or 16, and may rescind or modify any order made under this chapter, and direct that any one of the proceedings specified in section 13 be taken in lieu of the other of such proceedings, or that a right admitted under section 12 be commuted in the manner mentioned in section 14." I think those are all the sections which are necessary to be referred to for the purpose of this judgment.

It was urged on behalf of the petitioner that the meaning of the words "disposed of" in section 17, sub section (1) (a), was "disposed of according to law," that the Act contemplated an enquiry into the merits of the claim and that the Forest Settlement Officer must, under the provisions of the Regulation, either admit or reject the claim on the merits, and that inasmuch as the Forest Settlement Officer held that he was not empowered to decide the claim of the petitioner, there had been no disposal of the petitioner's claim in accordance with the Regulation. On the other hand, the learned Advocate General urged that the Act specified a special tribunal for adjudicating upon claims in respect of lands which it was proposed to convert into a reserved forest, that such claims must be submitted to the Forest Settlement Officer: and if the claimant was not satisfied with the order of the Forest Settlement Officer, there is an appeal provided by section 15 and that the decision upon the appeal must be final, that in this case the petitioner had submitted his claim to the Forest Settlement Officer who had rejected it and that the petitioner had not appealed and consequently there was an end of the matter in short, that the petitioner's claim had in fact been disposed of. The learned Advocate General drew our attention to paragraph 8 of the petition, from which it appears that one Annoda Charn Sen and another, who were also proprietors of some of the estates in question, raised similar objections in connection with lands adjoining the petitioner's and lying on the east of the watershed and their objections were similarly disallowed by Mr. Sankey, and that the said Annoda Charn and the others thereupon appealed to the Commissioner who directed the Settlement Officer to decide the objections upon evidence, and that thereupon by his judgment dated the 8th of March 1917 Mr. Sankey allowed their objections, holding that the lands claimed by them were not at the disposal of the Government, and excluded the same from the reserved forest; and the learned Advocate-General urged that the petitioner should have adopted the same course as that which was adopted by Annoda Charn Sen.

In my judgment the petitioner is on the horns of a dilemma. On the one hand, it may be said that by acceding to the view of the Forest Settlement Officer that he was not empowered to adjudicate upon the petitioner's claim and by the petitioner's Pleader stating that he merely put in his objection and offered to produce evidence as a safeguard to his client in any future proceeding before the Civil Courts, the petitioner did not really submit his claim to the Forest Settlement Officer, or at all events that he did not submit it to him for his adjudication. If this be the true view, then the petitioner did not adopt the course specified by the Regulation and he cannot now successfully contend that the notification was invalid on the ground that his claim was not disposed of. On the other hand, if the true position be that the petitioner did submit his claim to the Forest Settlemnt Officer for adjudication, then in my judgment it must be held that the Forest Settlement Officer rejected his claim. The words used by Mr. Sankey were "I disallow the objection," which in my judgment must be taken to be equivalent to rejecting the claim, which was thereby disposed of. The petitioner in this view, therefore, should have appealed to the Commissioner, as Annoda Charn did, and urged that his claim should be enquired into on the merits by the Forest Settlement Officer. He did not so appeal, and, he, therefore, failed to adopt the course specified by the Regulation. In my judgment, therefore, in either view the argument, that the petitioner's claim was not disposed of, fails: and, we ought not to hold that the notification of the 27th of August 1917 was invalid on the above-mentioned ground. It may be, however, that the petitioner and his advisers were misled to some extent by the course adopted by the Forst Settlement Officer, and by his remarks as to his previous decision being upheld by the Commissioner on appeal. Mr Sanyal, the learned Vakil who appeared for the petitioner, urged with respect to this suggestion that in consequence of the course adopted by Mr. Sankey and his remarks the petitioner was entitled to assume that his lands would be excluded from the reserved forest. Upon the question whether this was so or not I express no opinion. I merely draw attention to the fact that if there was really any misapprehension created by the decision or the remarks of the Forest Settlement Officer in the mind of the petitioner or his advisers and if the petitioner has really any merits in respect of his claim, section 20 of the Regulation provides that the Local Government "may rescind or modify any order passed under this chapter," and it may be that the petitioner is not entirely without a remedy.

For these reasons in my judgment this Rule should be discharged.

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 263 OF 1920.

June 17, 1920.

Present:—Mr Justice Jwala Prasad.

EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 411—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 239—Stolen property recovered from house of joint family—Managing member, responsibility of—Joint trial—Theft—Property recovered from various persons—Possession under joint control—Joint trial, legality of.

The presumption of possession which ordinarily attaches to the managing member of a family, and for which he is prima facie responsible, may be rebutted by the facts and circumstances of a particular case, and where it is not so rebutted and stolen properties are recovered from a house, the conviction of the managing member for the offence of being in possession of such properties is sustainable [p. 343, col. 1.]

Although different persons charged with separately retaining different articles of stolen property, which are the proceeds of the same theft, cannot be tried together, yet where the possession of different properties is under the joint control of all of them, or is due to concert or collusion amongst them, the joint-trial of all of them is not illegal. [p. 343, col. 2.]

MUSAI KAMAT v. EMPEROR.

Application against the order of the District Magistrate Bhagalpur, dated the 14th April 1920, confirming that of the Sub-Deputy Magistrate, Supaul, dated the 28th February 1920.

Mr. J. N. Maitra, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Manohar Lal, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioner, Musai Kamat, along with two others, Khubi Kamat, his son, and one Sukhawa Naw, was tried on a charge under section 411 of the Indian Penal Code for having been found in possession of stolen property belonging to one Hari Singh of Pipra. Khubi was acquitted. The petitioner and Sukhwa Naw were convicted and sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for six months each. The petitioner only appealed to the District Magistrate of Bhagalpur, who by his judgment, dated the 14th April 1920, confirmed the conviction and sentence. The petitioner has now come to this Court in revision.

The petitioner was convicted in respect of a chadar (Exhibit 2) and a sari (Exhibit 3). The chadar was concealed in the thatch or chhapar of a house belonging to the petitioner. In that house the petitioner and his son Khubi, along with two daughters of the petitioner, and other females, lived. It was not proved as to who concealed the chadar in the chhapar and also as to who was in exclusive possession of the house, in the chhapar of which the said property was found. Khubi was accordingly let off, and Musai, the petitioner, being the head member and owner of the house, was held responsible for the possession of the property.

The sari (Exhibit 3) was recovered from the possession of Musammat Tetri, daughter of the petitioner. She was wearing the sari at the time of its recovery by the Sub-Inspector. She has been examined as defence witness No. 2 in the case. She admits that the sari was with her, which the Sub-Inspector recovered from her. She says that it was brought by her brother, Khubi, and was part of a long piece of cloth; the other portion was given to her sister, who, she said, was then wearing it.

The accused did not claim the chadar, Exhibit 2. As to the sari (Exhibit 3) he stated that it belonged to his daughter. The Courts below have concurrently held that both the articles belonged to the complainant, Hari Singh, and were stolen from his house along with other properties. The learned Vakil on behalf of the petitioner disputes this finding. There is no force in this contention. The complainant, Hari Singh, has identified the articles as belonging to him and has produced an invoice in support of his statement. The merchant of Bhagalpur, from whom the complainant purchased them, has also been examined and has corroborated him. Nothing has been suggested why this evidence should not be accepted. The finding of the Courts below that the articles in question are stolen properties, is accepted.

The next contention is that it has not been shown that the petitioner was in exclusive possession of the place whence the chadar was recovered and hence he cannot be made liable for being in dishonest possession of the same. It is contended that the thatch from where the chadar was recovered was exposed to the public and that it is possible for a stranger to introduce it there. But there is no evidence on the record to support this contention. On the other hand, witness No. 4, Razi Khan, one of the witnesses for the search, clearly states in his evidence that Exhibit 2 was inside the thatch near the eaves and that outside people cannot go near the spot where the cloth was concealed in the thatch. Witness No. 5 says that the "thatch of the room was towards the angan side." Thus the possibility of any stranger putting the property under the thatch appears to be nil.

Now as to whether any other member of the accused's family could have put the chadar under the thatch without the knowledge of the petitioner. The thatch is between his residential house and his cow-shed, which are close to each other. That place was, therefore, pre-eminently fitted for the use by the male member of the house, i. e., the petitioner and his son, Khubi. In a small house like that of the petitioner and with no other member in the family except himself and his son, it is impossible to exonerate him as a head member of the family from the responsibilty of being in possession of the stolen property found concealed in the thatch of his residential house wherein he lives.

As regards the other property, that is, the sari, the petitioner's responsibility appears to be much more certain and clear. In paragraph 5 of the written statement, he admits that it belongs to his daughter. The daughter was wearing it publicly and the petitioner must, therefore, be charged with the knowledge as to how she came into possession of the same. Her explanation that it was given to her by her brother is obviously false. The claim of the petitioner that it belonged to the daughter is also false, because it has been conclusively shown that it belonged to the complainant. The defence of the accused is, therefore, dishonest. It has been suggested on behalf of the defence that the brother might have given the sari to the girl without the knowledge of the accused. He belongs to an ordinary cultivating class and as a head member is obviously in charge of feeding and clothing all the members of the family. He is the only person, therefore, to supply the sari in question to his daughter. There is, therefore, no substance in the contention that the possession in this case of the petitioner of the stolen properties has not been proved. Reliance has been placed upon the case of Amrit Sonar v. Emperor (1). The judgment in this case was delivered by myself and all that I held was that the presumption of possession, which ordinarily attaches to a managing member of a faimly and for which he is prima facie responsible, was rebutted by the facts and circumstances of that particular case. The question is, whether on the facts and circumstances of the present case that presumption has been rebutted. As already observed, it has not been. Therefore, upon the facts in this case, the Courts below were perfectly right in convicting the accused of the offence of being in possession of the stolen properties.

The learned Vakil on behalf of the petitioner has, however, at the close of his argument attacked the legality of the trial. The contention is that the petitioner, Musai could not be tried jointly with Sukhawa Naw for being in possession of different properties, though the booty of a single theft, committed in the house of Hari Singh. The proposition stated in the abstract may be accepted as correct. It is true that different persons charged with separately retaining different articles of stolen properties which are proceeds of the same theft, cannot be tried together. This proposition was enunciated in the case of Abdul Majid v. Emperor (2). Harrington, J., who laid down that proposition, qualified it at page 1267 of the report by observing that:

"No doubt several persons may retain the proceeds of robbery under their joint control and may jointly retain the whole proceeds, though they might deposit different articles in different places and might be jointly charged with retaining the whole."

Thus where the possession of different properties found with different persons is under the joint control of all of them, or is due to concert or collusion amongst them, a joint trial of all of them is not illegal, for the retention by all the persons in that case will be one transaction. The test of a joint trial of different persons is that the offences must have been committed in one transaction. If that test is fulfilled, the joint trial is not illegal. In the present case, the evidence of prosecution witness No. 6 Ladua, son-in-law of the petitioner, shows that there was a conspiracy amongst several persons of the village to commit dacoities and in the furtherence of that conspiracy, not only the present dacoity, but also others were committed and that the proceeds of all the dacoities were brought to the house of the petitioner, including those of the present dacoity, and were concealed in a field belonging to the petitioner and thereafter the properties in question were concealed in different places in the house of the petitioner and that of Sukhawa Naw, which are not very far from each other. The retention of the properties both in the field and in the houses of both the accused was due to the concert and collusion of them. The joint trial is not illegal. Besides the petitioner did not take the plea, which he is now taking, in the written statement filed in the trial Court, nor does this plea appear to have been taken in the cross-examination, nor in the arguments in the

(2) 33 C. 1256; 3 C. L. J. 412; 10 C. W. N. 912; 3 Cr. L. J. 391.

Courts below. The point has not, therefore, been dealt with in the judgments of the Courts below. The plea in question rests upon facts, namely, whether the retention of the stolen properties by the petitioner and Sukhawa Naw was on account of concert or collusion between them; and when there is evidence upon this point, it is not open to the petitioner to take this plea for the first time in revision. Of course if there were no evidence at all on the record, perhaps it might have been permissible for him to take this objection as no further investigation as to any fact would, then, have been involved. The objection now taken is, therefore, overruled.

The result is that the application is rejected.

I find, however, that the record of this case has been very badly prepared by the Magistrate. The examination-in-chief of a witness is at one place and the cross examination is at another, and often in continuation of the examination of some other witness, and sometimes it is very difficult to find out the examination or cross-examination of a particular witness.

Petition, under sections 435/439 of the Criminal Procedure Code, for revision of the order of the Sessions Judge, Lahore, dated the 15th March 1920, modifying that of the Special Magistrate, Lahore, dated the 27th January 1920.

Mr. Nand, for the Petitioner.

The Government Advocate and Lala Pindi Das, Public Prosecutor, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The petititoner C. A. Heymerdinguer, a District Traffic Superintendent on the North Western Railway, has been tried and convicted by the Magistrate of taking two bribes of Rs. 1,000 each, one from Ishar Das on 28th February 1918, and one from Bodhraj on the 16th April 1918, and sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment on each charge, sentences to run concurrently. The Sessions Judge on appeal has upheld the conviction on the first charge only, viz., the taking of a bribe from Ishar Das on the 28th February and reduced the sentence to one year's rigorous imprisonment.

The first point raised in this application for revision is that there is no legal sanction complying with the requirements of section 197 (1), Criminal Procedure Code. The prosecution rely on the sanction of the Railway Board, and cite that part of section 197 (1) which runs "or other authority to which such.....public servant is subordinate and whose power to give such sanction has not been limited by such Government." It is not contended that the power of the Railway Board has been limited. What is contended is that the petitioner is not subordinate to the Railway Board. Seeing that appointments to such posts as District Traffic Superintendent are gazetted under the signature of the Secretary to the Board, I take it that the appointments are made by the Board. And if so, presumably the Board also has the power to dismiss. (Here reference may be made to Article 289 of the State Railways Open Line Code, Volume II.) I do not stop to notice other gazette notifications which have been pointed out to me giving the Board various powers. I merly note that the preamble to the the Indian Railway Board Act, 1905, states that the Board has been constituted for controlling the administration of railways in India. I do not see how they can effectively control such railways if the servants of such railways are not subordinate to them. And I should certainly say as a general proposition that an official was subordinate to the authority which appointed him and which has the power to dismiss him. Mr. Nood for the petitioner contends that the Railway Board exercises certain powers such as appointments which they are not legally empowered to exercise as such Board and that really when exercising these powers, they do so merely as the Railway Department of the Secretariat of Commerce and Industry. But the Board professes to make appointments as the Board, and I see no reason to suppose that the appointments are not really made by the Board; their authority as the Board to make such appointments has, so far as I know, never been questioned up to the present, and I see no reason to presume that they are exceeding their powers. I hold that petitioner is subordinate to the Board. He is I should certainly say, subordinate to the Traffic Manager and to the Agent, but these too are, in my opinion, all subordinate to the Board and the District Traffic Superintendent is, a fortiori, subordinate.

Then it is contended that the sanction is merely that of the President, and that the President alone is not the Board as the Board consists of the President and two members. Had the sanction been signed by the Secretary, apparently Mr. Nood would have acknowledged it as valid. Or had all the members signed it, apparently Mr. Nood would have admitted its validity. But, as Mr. Herbert points out, no set form of sanction is required by section 197 (1). What happened was that the Agent of the North Western Railway wrote asking for sanction. The answer was a letter, dated 29th August 1919, from the Secretary of the Railway Board saying sanction had been given by the Board. The letter runs, "I am directed to communicate sanction." Later on comes the letter or order of the 4th November 1919, saying "the Railway Board sanctions," etc.; this is signed by the President. This I take to be merely the expression of the sanction, and I take it that the whole Board as a Board did give sanction. I see no reason whatever to presume that the President gave sanction without the knowledge and consent and co-operation of his colleagues. I see no reason to presume that the President was not stating the facts correctly when he signed the order saying "the Railway Board sanctions." This order I take to be not the sanction itself, but the formal expression or evidence of that sanction. I hold, therefore, that sanction was properly given.

The facts of the case are stated at length in the judgments of the lower Courts, and it is unnecessary to repeat them. Mr. Nood wished to go into the facts of both charges of bribery, but as the Sessions Judge rightly points out, there are certain facts which make the prosecution on the first charge stronger than that on the second.

The learned Sessions Judge may or may not be right in acquitting on the second charge, I am quite prepared to hold the second charge not proved. But even assuming that charge to be, not merely not proved, but even false, I cannot see that this is any sufficient ground for holding the first charge also to be false. It is urged that the two charges are similar and that if the one is false, the other is also probably false. But all that can be said in my opinon is that there are certain circumstances in the second charge which have been held to justify an acquittal on that charge, and that those circumstances do not exist in the first charge.

The direct evidence in the case is that of the bribe giver Ishar Das, and the two witnesses in whose presence the bribe was given. With regard to this part of the evidence Mr. Nood points to two things: (1) the suppression or omission by Ishar Das in the earlier part of his evidence of the visit to Jivan Singh, and (2) the unsatisfactory explanation given as the reason for taking Bhagat Ram, viz., that he was wanted as an interpreter. These points have not been overlooked by the lower Courts, and I do not see in them anything of real importance. Had the case been a conspiracy and had there been any real object in suppressing the visit to Jiwan Singh, surely Harnam Das and Bhagat Ram would also have suppressed it. As to the reason given for Bhagat Ram's presence, apparently the real reason was that he went simply as a witness; if he and Ishar Das and Harman Das foolishly thought that some further explanation was necessary, and invented a foolish one, I do not think this is any sufficient ground for doubting their whole story. Whether their story should be rejected really depends on whether there is sufficient corroboration. There is a good deal of corroboration as to their movements from one place to another, but the main corroboration as to the taking of the bribe seems to be (1) the payment by petitioner into the Savings Bank of Rs. 1,000 on the 1st March, and (2) the fact that Messrs. Tata & Company got wagons after 28th February though they had not got them before.

As to the payment into Bank the contention in this Court is that it was a mere coincidence that this exact amount was paid in, and that it was a lump sum paid in out of petitioner's race winnings. It is also urged that the prosecution should have been able to prove how petitioner paid in Rs. 1,000, whether in cash or in notes, and if in notes, of what denomination. But as far as is apparent, the Alliance Bank had no records in existence at the date of the first enquiry into these charges which would give the above information. Mr. Nood says the Treasurer's note book should shew the details. But there is nothing to shew that the Treasurer keeps any such note book. He may perhaps keep rough notes, though even this is not apparent from the record, but if he does there is nothing to shew how long he keeps them. In any case the information in question, even if forthcoming, would not conclusively prove the case one way or the other. If petitioner paid in Rs. 1,000 in ten notes of Rs. 100 each, still in the absence of proof of the numbers of the notes alleged to have been given as a bribe it might be said on petitioner's behalf that these were not proved to be the same notes; if it were shewn that the payment to the Bank was not in notes of Rs. 100, it might be said for the prosecution that petitioner had changed the notes. An application was made to me to admit further evidence to prove that there was no further race meeting after the end of March at which petitioner acted as bookmaker. I am quite prepared to assume this to be correct. But assuming that petitioner knew on the 1st March that bookmaking for him was over for the season, still the question is, has the payment of Rs. 1,000 been satisfactorily explained. Mr. Nood argues thus: if this Rs. 1,000 was not the race winnings then what became of those winnings? Did they vanish into thin air? The answer seems to me obvious, and is as follows. According to the defence the petitioner won a considerable sum, estimated at Rs. 2,500 to Rs. 3,000, on the races; this deposit of Rs. 1,000 is the only deposit which has been alleged by petitioner to be a deposit of race winnings; then what became of the remaining winnings, say Rs. 1,500 to Rs. 2,000? Did this vanish into thin air? Petitioner says he won a considerable sum, but he has no accounts. He puts this deposit of Rs. 1,000 down to race winnings, and for him it is argued that in the absence of other proof as to what became of those winnings his explanation should be accepted. It might have been accepted perhaps if he had accounted for the rest of the winnings. That Ishar Das knew of the deposit of Rs. 1,000 made on 1st March when he first came forward with his story of the bribe appears to me utterly improbable. It seems to me far too wonderful a coincidence that he should have brought forward a false story of a bribe of Rs. 1,000 given on the very day before petitioner paid exactly this sum into the Bank, and I say this not in the least forgetting that there is good evidence to show that petitioner won considerable sums of money at race meetings terminating with a meeting in the latter part of March. I consider this payment of Rs. 1,000 on the 1st March is strong corroboration of the story told by Ishar Das and his companions.

Both as regards the story of the bribe taking and the deposit there is the argument, would petitioner be such a fool as to take money before witnesses one day and to pay the very same sum into the Bank the next day. The learned Sessions Judge has considered this argument fully, and I see no reason to differ from his conclusions. I would only add that if criminals did not commit rash mistakes fewer crimes would be detected.

A great deal of time has been occupied in this Court in arguments to shew that if Tata & Sons did not get wagons for their cotton before 1st March, it was because wagons were scanty and American cotton had no priority till March, and that after 1st March when wagons were more plentiful and American cotton got priority, Tata & Sons were not unduly favoured, and I have been referred to many of the documents filed as exhibits, but I fear the case for the defence is by no means improved. The letter from the Traffic Manager (Exhibit B 27) giving priority to American cotton is dated 22nd February 1918, and presumably reached Multan on the 23rd. Petitioner initialled it, but the accompanying date is not clear. The instructions from the District Traffic Superintendent to Station Master should have issued promptly, but they were drafted only on the 28th February signed by the District Traffic Superintendent on the 1st March and issued on the 2nd March. For the prosecution it is pointed out that according to Ishar Das negotiations with Lal Chand had opened on the 20th February but the bribe was not paid till the 25th. Had instructions as to priority of American cotton been issued promptly on receipt of the Traffic Manager's orders, would Ishar Das have paid up the bribe? Possibly not. The explanation offered for the defence is that the District Traffic Superintendent was out on tour on the line, but his Travelling Allowance Bill (Exhibit B.35) shows that he was in Multan from 23rd to 27th February. An alternative explanation is that Lal Chand is responsible for hanging up the issue of instructions.

For the prosecution attempts have been made to show that wagons were withheld before the 28th February when they might have been supplied, but I doubt if this has been clearly established. But there is on the file a telegram No. 298 from the Traffic Manager, dated 7th March 1918, stopping traffic, and a later telegram No. 317, dated 9th April 1918, re-opening it for cotton, and it is pointed out that Tata & Sons got 70 odd wagons between those dates. So there appears considerable reason to suppose that Tata & Sons were favoured in March and April. In fact in the Sessions Court it seems not to have been argued that Tata & Sons were not favoured, but that there were sufficient reasons for favouring them. As to putting the blame on to Lal Chand I do not think this is possible. There has been a good deal of discussion as to Exhibit B 4 in which petitioner in December 1917 tells Station Masters: "In no case is anyone to be given a wagon out of turn. If any order is received from my office to give a certain merchant wagons it means that he is to be supplied in the order of registration, whether military, E. G. or public goods." For the defence Mr. Boalth's evidence is referred to as showing that this was quite a proper letter. But Mr. Boalth expresses himself very guardedly as regards this letter, saying that on the face of it, it does not strike him as improper, because any Station Master reading it would think that a special order was coming down from a higher authority, but that if the District Traffic Superintendent was reserving to himself power to issue orders on his own motion giving priority to one merchant he would be acting wrongly. Mr. Boalth adds that he never gave any merchant priority nor had any intention of doing so. Now if petitioner never intended to give priority to any merchant, what need was there to talk of orders from his office to give a certain merchant wagons? If every merchant was to get his proper turn, what need of orders from the District Traffic Supetintendent's Office regarding any particular merchant? Orders did issue in some cases, as other Exhibits shew. The best explanation that can be offered for the defence is that it was simply to get rid of importunate visitors to petitioner's office, though really the orders were not meant to give undue preference to any one. All that I can say is that the letter, Exhibit B.4, is a most suspicious one, and in my opinion Station Masters were given a plain hint thereby that the District Traffic Superintendent would be likely to issue orders relating to certain merchants, but that in correspondence at least regulations must be observed.

As to the argument that wagons became more plentiful after 1st March, it is not shewn where they came from but certain registers are pointed to shewing that later on traders in general got their goods away promptly. I am unable to come to any clear finding as to Messrs. Tata and Sons having been improperly kept out of wagons till 1st March and unduly favoured thereafter, but I regard Exhibit D.4 as a highly suspicious letter which has not been explained and I regard the hanging up of the instructions giving priority to American cotton as exactly fitting in with the story of the bribe being given on the 28th February though arranged on an earlier date. I note that an application has been made to me to call for the records of another case to show the supply of wagons on 12th April 1918, but I regard this as totally unnecessary for the purpose of the present case.

All I can say about the wagons is that had the instructions as to American cotton been promptly issued, Messrs. Tata and Sons should have been able to get wagons some days earlier than 1st March, whereas apparently they only began to get wagons on 1st March.

Then it is said that certain inadmissible evidence has wrongly been admitted, especially evidence relating to petitioner's Bank account prior to 1st March, and that though the learned Sessions Judge has said he has rejected this evidence, he must infallibly have been prejudiced. The same argument might apply to myself. I decline to admit that a Judicial Officer cannot, though aware of certain evidence, reject it and judge the case fairly on the merits of the remaining evidence. It is said that the Sessions Judge, though professing to disregard the above evidence, clearly had it in view when he speaks of its being proved that Lal Chand was petitioner's dalal. But this finding might equally have been arrived at without the evidence as to the old banking account being on the record at all.

Then it is urged that Police diaries have been wrongly used as evidence. I cannot see this. Where they have been referred to, it is merely to test the evidence given in Court.

Then it is urged that statements by persons that Ishar Das said certain things to them are secondary evidence and mere hearsay. But where such statements are admissible under section 157, Evidence Act, surely they can be proved by any one to whom they were made. The evidence of a person who hears a statement is as direct proof of that statement being made as the evidence of a person who sees a deed is proof of the deed being done; the latter is called an eye-witness, the former may well be described as an ear-witness. Each deposes to what has come to his personal knowledge through one of his senses.

Then the matter of dismissal of certain Station Masters is referred to. The learned Sessions Judge is not quite correct here. Mr. Boalth's evidence shows that petitioner merely recommended that they should be reduced a grade, but that Mr. Boalth dismissed them. But I do not see that this makes any material difference to the case.

Then there is the matter of Mr. Henriques not being re-called for further cross-examination after the charge. I do not think Mr. Henriques was a very material witness and the Sessions Judge's record shows that all that the defence wanted to ask him about was the date of his interview with petitioner and that Counsel in the Sessions Judge's Court was quite content when the Sessions Judge was prepared to assume that the interview was prior to 28th February. Mr. Nood argues that further questions might have been asked, but in the face of what was said in the Sessions Court I am not prepared to assume that any further questions would have been asked.

Then it is urged that the Sessions Judge decided the case on points not raised in arguments before him, thus depriving Counsel of right of reply. As an instance it is urged that the Sessions Judge wrongly assumes that Ishar Das is shrewd and gets over all difficulties by talking of Ishar Das's shrewdness. The Sessions Judge has, as far as I can see, confined himself to relevant facts, and I fail to see that petitioner has any cause to complain.

Then it is urged that Mathra Das was not called and that Lal Chand's evidence denying that any bribe was given in his presence has wrongly been disbelieved. The prosecution is not bound to call any witness who they do not think will state the truth. Lal Chand was called by the Court. As was only to be expected he denied the truth of Ishar Das's story; I do not see why his evidence should have been regarded as carrying weight.

Then it is urged that petitioner was made to give up his plea of being a European British subject by the Magistrate insisting on evidence from England;

there is nothing at all on the record to support this.

I have dealt with all points argued before me. The case has, with regard to some parts of the evidence, been argued as if it were an appeal, and my present order in parts reads much as if it were the judgment of an Appellate Court.

The learned Sessions Judge has discussed the case fully, and I am unable to discover any reason for holding his decision to be incorrect. I can find no reason whatever for interference, and I dismiss this application for revision. The petitioner should surrender to his bail before the District Magistrate or to the Superintendent, Jail; failing this he will be re arrested.

Application dismissed.

Revision against the decision of the Sessions Judge, Noakhali, dated the 5th July 1919.

JUDGMENT.

SANDERSON, C. J.—This is a Rule granted to show cause why an order sanctioning the prosecution of the seven petitioners by Mr. Ghatak, the learned Judge, should not be set aside.

The matter comes before us under section 195 (6) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which provides that "Any sanction given or refused under this section may be revoked or granted by any authority to which the authority giving or refusing it is subordinate," and, this Court has to decide whether the sanction given by the learned Sessions Judge should be revoked in the case of all the petitioners or in the case of any of them. The conclusion of the learned Judge's judgment was in these terms: "I accordingly sanction prosecution of the opposite parties or such of them as are guilty of the offences mentioned or any of such offences." It was argued by the learned Vakil who appeared on behalf of the petitioners that this order was irregular and could not stand and that the learned Judge ought to have decided with regard to each of the petitioners whether it was proper to sanction the prosecution against him. The learned Vakil who appeared for the complainant has abandoned his application for sanction as regards petitioners Nos. 4, 5, 6 and 7; and, consequently inasmuch as the application was on behalf of the complainant alone, the Crown having taken no part in the proceedings, I do not think it is necessary to investigate the case of those petitioners any further; and, as far as petitioners Nos. 4 to 7 are concerned, the sanction which has been granted is revoked.

As regards the other three petitioners, before arriving at our decision it is necessary to state certain facts, which, I think, show that the proceedings in this case were out of the ordinary: It appears that one Chaudhuri Meah lodged a case against Abdul Rahaman under section 471 and other sections. The Magistrate summoned the accused Abdul Rahaman and held an enquiry in his presence in the course of which a large number of witnesses were examined at the instance of Chaudhuri Meah, and they were cross-examined at some length by the accused. The Magistrate disbelieved Chaudhuri Meah's case, discharged the accused and ordered that Chaudhuri Meah and his witnesses Nobin Chandra Mojumdar and Kashi Chandra Mojumdar, who are the second and third petitioners in this Court, should be prosecuted for bringing a false case. Against that order a motion was preferred before the learned Sessions

Judge who, after an investigation, held that there was sufficient evidence against Abdul Rahaman and that the order of discharge was improper on the evidence. The result was that the learned Judge set aside the order of discharge and directed a further inquiry. The case was heard by another Deputy Magistrate, who found that there was a prima facie case against the accused Abdul Rahaman and committed him to the Sessions. The case was tried before Mr. De, the learned Sessions Judge, and the accused was acquitted, the learned Judge saying that he acquitted him on the ground that he considered that there was a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the accused. During these proceedings, the order for the prosecution of Chaudhuri Meah and petitioners Nos. 2 and 3 was in abeyance. Then Chaudhuri Meah, Nobin and Kashi applied to the learned Sessions Judge to refer the order for the prosecution of them to the High Court, so that it might be quashed. The learned Judge refused so to do and gave a considered judgment setting out his reasons for his refusal. Then an application was made to the High Court for a Rule to set aside the order made by the Magistrate, directing the prosecution of Chandhuri Meah and his two witnesses. Upon that application my learned brothers Mr. Justice Richardson and Mr. Justice Shamsul Huda set aside the order, mainly on the ground that it was made more than a year ago and at a time when the evidence had not been so fully brought before the Court as it was afterwards. They, therefore, set aside that order, but directed that an application might be made by the District Magistrate to the learned Sessions Judge to make an order under section 476. They also directed that it would be open to the learned Sessions Judge, if he was moved under section 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, to sanction the prosecution of the petitioners. Subsequently an application was made to Mr. Ghatak, the learned Sessions Judge, for sanction to prosecute not only Chandhuri Meah and his two witnesses Nobin and Kashi but also the other petitioners, and thereupon the learned Judge made the order which I have read.

Now, the question remains whether my learned brother and I are prepared to uphold the sanction which has been granted by the learned Sessions Judge as regards the first three petitioners Chaudhuri Meah, Nobin and Kashi.

I desire it to be clearly understood that anything I say in my judgment is not intended to be in any way departing from or minimising what was said by the late learned Chief Justice in Mr. Hume Public Prosecutor v. Poresh Chunder Ghose (An Attorney, In re) (1) At page 45δ* he said: "There are, however, certain rules of prudence to which any Court exercising its discretion would have regard, and pre-eminent among them, possibly a compendious statement of all, would be the rule that the Court will be astute to see that there shall be no abuse of the administration of criminal justice." The learned Chief Justice had already pointed out that the matter was one for the discretion of the Court to which the application was made. Our decision in this case is arrived at upon the peculiar and somewhat special facts of this case, and the conclusion at which we arrive is that the sanction which has been granted with regard to the first three petitioners should be revoked. In my judgment the matters disclosed in the various judgments and proceedings to which I have referred go to show that if proceedings were taken against these three petitioners, there is a strong probability that they would be abortive. On these grounds in my judgment the sanction should be revoked.

The Rule is made absolute as regards all the petitioners.

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 369 OF 1919.

July 4, 1919.

MRS PEAL—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 250, 435, 454—Revision application, whether subsequent stage of same case—Complainant a European British subject—Right to make claim under s. 454—Jurisdiction.

An application for revision is an independent matter giving a right to apply to a superior Court independently of any proceedings necessarily subsequent or consequent upon the hearing of the original case, and is not a subsequent stage of the same case within the meaning of section 454 of the Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 351, col. 2.]

The High Court at Allahabad has jurisdiction to entertain an application for revision of an order of the City Magistrate of Lucknow in a case in which the complainant is a European British subject, irrespective of whether he has made a claim to be dealt with as such, against whom an order under section 250 of the Criminal Procedure Code has been made. Criminal revision from an order of the City Magistrate, Lucknow.

Mr. C. Thompson, for the Opposite Party.

Mr. Lalit Mohan Banerji (Officiating Assistant Government Advocate), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application in revision against an order made by the City Magistrate of Lucknow on the 22nd of May 1919 awarding compensation to a defendant against a complainant under section 250 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The complainant was a person of the name of Harris, whose complaint was dismissed. He claimed to be a European British subject, a fact which is disputed, but for the purpose of the preliminary objection it must be assumed. He applies in revision to this Court to question the order made against him under section 250 by the City Magistrate of Lucknow. Nobody can doubt that a superior Criminal Court has jurisdiction, under section 435 and the other appropriate sections of the Criminal Procedure Code, to examine an order under section 250 of the Code of Criminal Procedure in the exercise of its ordinary revisional jurisdiction. The question is whether assuming that a person against whom such an order has been made is a European British subject, this High Court has jurisdiction in the case of an order made by the City Magistrate of Lucknow. I think it has. The High Court in such case is, as defined by section 4 (1), to mean the High Court of Judicature of the North-Western Provinces in reference to proceedings against European British subjects. I think this was certainly a proceeding. I do not know what else it could possibly be called. It clearly was against Mr. Harris and it ordered him to pay a sum as compensation, and it is assumed for the purpose of this objection that he is a European British subject.

A further argument was submitted, namely, that Mr. Harris, assuming that he is a European British subject, has relinquished his right under section 454. I do not agree with this view. Section 454 provides that if a European British subject does not claim to be dealt with as such by the Magistrate (that obviously refers to a charge made against him in respect of which he may be tried by the Magistrate or committed), he shall be held to have relinquished his right to be dealt with on any special terms applicable to a European British subject and shall not assert it at any subsequent stage of the same case. In the first place, I do not think an application in revision is a subsequent stage of the same case. It is a totally independent matter giving a right to apply to a superior Court independently of any proceedings necessarily subsequent or consequent upon the hearing of the original case. Secondly, I do not think Mr. Harris, assuming that he was a European British subject, would have had any right to make the claim at all under section 454. It had become a complaint in the Court of the City Magistrate of Lucknow and all the provisions of the Code applicable to complainants were applicable to him. Section 250 was applicable to him, whether he was a European British subject or not and, therefore, there was nothing that he could relinquish. Thirdly, I think the jurisdiction of this Court or of Oudh, as the case may be, in these matters must depend on a question of fact and not upon the question whether a man chooses to make a particular claim in a particular case or not. The question of fact is whether this proceeding was one against a European British subject. It does not seem to matter in the least whether he chose to make the claim or not. In my opinion this is the proper Court,

The preliminary objection fails subject to the determination of the question whether he is a European British subject, with which I will deal at a later stage.

I find as a fact that Mr. Harris is a European British subject.

Calcutta Municipal Act (III of 1899), s. 341—"When a fixture has been attached to a building," meaning of—Applicability of section—Duty of prosecution.

The words "when a fixture has been attached to a building" in section 241 of the Calcutta Municipal Act mean that the building must first be in existence and the attachment of the fixture subsequent to the erection of the building, and the words cannot be applied to a part of a building constructed at the same time as the main building itself. In order to apply the provisions of the section, it is incumbent on the prosecution to prove the facts upon which its applicability depends.

Revision against an order of the 2nd Municipal Magistrate, Calcutta, dated the 23rd December 1918.

Babus Manmatha Nath Mukherjee and Probodh Chandra Chatterjee, for the Petitioner.

Babu Satindra Nath Mukherjee, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is a Rule calling upon the Chairman of the Corporation and the Municipal Magistrate to show cause why the order complained of should not be set aside. The order complained of was passed by the Municipal Magistrate on the 23rd December 1918. He has held a certain structure to be a fixture which is liable to be removed under section 341 of the Calcutta Municipal Act III of 1899 and has directed its demolition under section 450 (3) of that Act. In our opinion it has not been proved that the provisions of section 341 are applicable to the structure which is the subject matter of this dispute. The structure in question is a masonry platform which extends in front of the petitioner's building and over a drain in the public street. There is no evidence when this masonry platform was erected. But witnesses have deposed that so far as living memory goes, the masonry platform has been in existence as a part of the building. In order to take advantage of a penal section it is necessary for the prosecution to prove the facts on which the applicability of that section depends. Sction 341 applies to a fixture which "has been attached to a building so as to form part of the building and causes a projection, encroachment or obstruction over or on any public street." As we understand them, the words "fixture which has been attached to a building" cannot be applied to a part of the building which was constructed at the same time as the main building itself. The words "when a fixture has been attached" seem to us to mean that the building must first be in existence and the attachment of the fixture subsequent to the erection of the building. Taking this view, as it has not been proved that the platform in question was constructed after the building was erected, we must hold that the Municipal Magistrate had no power to pass the order complained of and we must, therefore, make this Rule absolute and set aside that order.

The sole landlord of a raiyat is competent to sell, in execution of a money-decree against the raiyat, his occupancy holding, whether the holding be or be not transferable by custom or local usage. [p. 377, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Dacca, dated the 4th of May 1918, affirming the order of the Munsif, 1st Court at Munshigunge, dated the 2nd of February 1918.

FACTS appear from the following Order of Reference to a Full Bench:—

MOOKERJEE AND HENDERSON, JJ.—(August 21st, 1919.)—This is an appeal by a decree-holder against an order made by the Court of Appeal below in affirmance of an order of the Court of first instance dismissing an application for execution of a decree. The applicants hold a decree for money against the respondent, and in execution of that decree have attached his holding. If so happens that the applicants are the landlords of the respondent. The respondent is a raiyat with right of occupancy. His objection is that the holding is not transferable by custom or usage, and cannot be sold in execution of the decree held by the applicants. The Courts below have given effect to this objection and have held that a non-transferable occupancy holding cannot be sold in execution of a decree for money, even though the decree-holder be the sole landlord of the raiyat. There is no authority in this Court directly in point, but reliance has been placed by the appellant and the respondent upon decisions, in support of their respective contentions, which cannot be reconciled. The point was raised in Macpherson v. Debi Bhushan (1), where it was ruled that a sixteen annas landlord cannot sell his raiyat's occupancy holding in execution of a money-decree, unless the raiyat's occupancy holding is transferable by usage. It was pointed out that the rule propounded in Ananda Das v. Ratnakar (2), Shukuruddin Chowdhury v. Rani Hemangini Debi (3) and Dwarkanath v. Tarini Sankar (4) cannot be reconciled with the decision in Agarjan Bibi v. Panaulla (5). The decision of the Full Bench in Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy (6) does not directly touch the question; and the appellants have contended that the operation of the propositions enunciated by the Full Bench should not be extended on logical grounds to cases, in which the circumstances are fundamentally different from those of the litigations which led to the Full Bench reference. Dr. Dwarka Nath Mitter has further argued that the Full Bench could not have intended to legislate in this matter, and that expressions of opinion which went beyond the reference and were not required for the decision of the question actually before the Court, however valuable, cannot be regarded as binding. The respondent has referred to the decision in Narayani v. Nabin Chandra (7) and later decisions where that case has been followed. The respondent has conceded that these cases do not directly help his contentions; but he has argued that the principle enunciated therein, as a logical extension of the rules formulated by the Full Bench, should be logically extended a step further. In this state of conflict of judicial opinion, we must refer the question which requires decision in the case before us, to a Full Bench. That question may be formulated in the following terms: Is the sole landlord of a raiyat competent to sell, in execution of a money-decree against the raiyat, his occupancy holding, unless the holding is transferable by usage or custom? Under the rules of the Court, the whole appeal is referred to the Full Bench.

Dr. Dwarkanath Mitter (with him Babus Manindra Nath Banerjee, Bireswar Bagchi and Narayan Chandra Kar), for the Appellant.—This reference arises out of an appeal by a decree-holder landlord from an order of the District Judge of Dacca, affirming an order of dismissal passed by the Munsif on an application for execution of a decree. A decree-holder landlord obtained a money-decree against a tenant who was an occupancy ryot. The landlords representing the 16-annas interest sold the holding in execution thereof. The judgment debtor objected to the execution taking place on the ground that the holding, not being transferable by custom or local usage, could not be sold in execution of a money-decree. Both the Courts below upheld the objection. The lower Appellate Court in upholding the objection relied on the the case of Narayani v. Nabin Chandra (7) and held that the point was covered by the Full Bench decision in Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy (6). My point before the Division Bench was that the present point was not covered by the decision in Dayamoyi's case (6). The three questions which led to the reference in that case did not involve the present question. Secondly, the general enunciations in that case, although they do cover the present case, were not involved in that reference. They must be regarded as obiter dicta and, therefore, they are not binding on you. Reads the questions referred to in each of the cases to the Full Bench in Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy (6),] The larger question, viz, whether a non-transferable occupancy holding can be transferred, has been answered in the affirmative. (Reads at page 224.) In all these it was assumed that the landlord had the right to object. The arguments show that the position was assumed to be correct that the transfer could be validated with the landlord's consent. I would contend that this refers to a case other than the present case under consideration. The whole scope of that reference was quite different from the present.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—That aspect of the question was not discussed in that case. We are not bound by that Full Bench case.]

Then I will proceed to examine the correct state of the law. There is no statutory provision that it is transferable except in some cases. I shall contend with regard to the provisions relating to sub-letting.

[MUKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—There is no doubt that the entire body of landlords can sell the holding for the arrears of the entire holding.]

Here the decree is for money. Refers to section 65 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. The property I submit, is not altogether inalienable. It is not a personal right. The Act at any rate improved the ryot's position from that under Act X of 1859 including the right of transferability. (Reads section 183, illustration (1) of the Bengal Tenancy Act.) That shows that prior to the Act the holding was transferable only with the consent of the landlord. If I show that there is the power of voluntary transfer in the ryot, there is also power of involuntary transfer. The power of voluntary transfer is the measure of involuntary alienation. If he can sell it, it follows necessarily that it can be taken from him in execution against him. In that case the landlord's assent was wanting. That Act does not make it altogether inalienable. The word "non transferable" did not intend to connote that the property was extra commercium. Landlord's consent would make it so.

[CHAUDHURI, J.—What is the nature of the right?]

It is the right to remain.

[CHAUDHURI, J.—Does it involve that I shall be able to let some one else remain on the land?]

The right of ownership also includes the right of transfer. The right, I submit, is personal.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—What is the first case in which the question was raised by the tenant?]

Toramonee Dassee v. Birressur (8). The first Full Bench case on the point has been reported as Ajoodhya Pershad v. Imam Bandi Begum (9). The referring Judges did not go the length of holding that the consent of the landlord would make it transferable.

CHAUDHURI, J.—It is described as a prescriptive right of tenancy. The Act also makes it inheritable?]

(8) 1 W. R. 86.

That is exactly my submission that it has the character of property. My propositions are:—(1) That the power of voluntary transfer is the measure of the power of involuntary alienation, as has been aptly put by Sir Lawrence Jenkins. (2) That the power of voluntary alienation with the landlord's consent has never been questioned. Therefore, it follows (3) that an involuntary alienation with the consent of the landlord passes good title as in the case of voluntary alienation. (4) That assuming that the power of voluntary alienation is not the measure of involuntary alienation, there is no case which has laid down that an occupancy right cannot be sold in execution of a money-decree with the landlord's consent except an obiter in Bhiram Ali v. Gopi Kant (10).

With regard to my first proposition, I would draw your attention to section 60 of the Civil Procedure Code. If the tenant has the power to sell, then it is not rested on the principle of estoppel. Refers to Behari Lal v. Sindhubala (11). In that case the gift of an occupancy holding was upheld. Refers to Mohesh Narain Roy v. Maharaj Bahadur Singh (12). If by 'non-transferable' is meant that no sort of transfer is possible, then one fails to understand how the transfer with the consent of the landlord and the tenant could be held to be valid. The difficulty with regard to the involuntary sales is that the tenant cannot say that he would consent to the property being taken in execution. It has not been laid down that the consent of both is necessary. My contention is if the tenant can voluntarily sell, he could be forced to sell in execution of a decree against him.

[FLETCHER, J.—With the consent or otherwise of the landlord?]

Yes, my lord. Refers to Abhoy Sankar v. Rajani Mandal (13). Even under Act X of 1859 the position was the same.

[CHAUDHURI, J.—What does the landlord assent to?]

There would, of course, be nothing to ratify. I would rely in support of my contention to the cases of Dwarka Nath Misser v. Hurrish Chunder (14), Ananda Das v. Ratnakar (2), Agarjan Bibi v. Panaulla (5), Purna Chandra Trivadi v. Chandra Moni Dassi (15) and Wood v. Wood (16). All these cases support my first proposition that the power of voluntary alienation is the measure of involuntary alienation.

Now, I come to my second proposition that the power of voluntary alienation with the consent of the landlord has never been questioned. No case in the books can be found taking a contrary view. I will begin, my lords, with earlier reports from the Sudder Dewany Adalut Decisions and Weekly Reporter cases. Refers to Baboo Prosonokoomar Tagore v. Rammohun Doss (17), Fifth Report, Volume II, page 84, paragraph 359; Harrington's Analysis of Bengal Regulations, Volume III, pages 434, 460; Thakooranee Dosees v. Bisheshur (18), Ajoodhya Pershad v. Imam Bandi Begum (9), Huro Chunder Goho v. Mr. A. D. Dunn (19), Watson & Co. v. Ranee Shurut Soonduree Debia (20), Tara Pershad v. Soorjo Kant (21) and Hyder Buksh v. Bhubendro Deb (22).

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—Were the last two cases of voluntary alienation?]

Yes, my lord. Refers to Chandrabati v. Harrington (23). These cases show that previous to the Act X of 1859 the right of occupancy was entirely non-transferable. Refers to Bibee Suhodra v. Maxwell Smith (24) and Nurendro Narain Roy v. Ishan Chunder Sen (25). That finishes the cases reported in the Weekly Reporter series.

I now come to the cases reported in the Indian Law Reports Series and the Calcutta Weekly

Notes series. Palakdhari Rai v. Manners (26), Ananda Das v. Ratnakar (2), Jagun Proshad v Posun Sahoo (27) and Srimutty Sibo Sundari Ghose v. Raj Mohun Guho (28). These cases show that the transfer is voidable at the option of the landlord. Refers as Hari Das Bairagi v. Udoy Chandra Das (29); Udoy Chandra Das v. Hari Das Bairagi (30) and Mohesh Narain Roy v. Maharaj Bahadur Singh (12). Then we come to Dayamoyi's case (6). I submit that that case is not binding except in so far as it decides the question referred to the Full Bench. Then as to the cases subsequent to the Full Bench decision we have got Behari Lal v. Sindhubala (11).

Then as to my third proposition, viz., that an involuntary alienation with the consent of the landlord passes good title as in the case of voluntary alienation, I submit my first two propositions having been established it follows as a necessary inference deducible from them that an involuntary alienation passes good title as much as a voluntary alienation.

Then as to my fourth proposition, I submit that assuming that the power of voluntary alienation is not the measure of involuntary alienation, there is no case which has laid down that an occupancy right cannot be sold in execution of a money-decree with the landlord's consent except an obiter in Bhiram Ali's case (10).

[TEUNON, J.—How do you apply that case in support of your contention?]

There the suit was for recovery of possession after purchase at the execution sale and recognition by the landlord. The tenants objected on the ground that the holding was not transferable. The decision is in my favour in so far as it lays down that occupancy holdings are transferable. Bhiram-Ali's case (10) was followed in only some of the cases in this Court. The first of them is Durga Charan v. Kali Prasanna (31). There the holding was sold at the instance of a number of co-sharer landlords. The tenants objected after the confirmation of the sale at the time of delivery of possession. This decision merely followed Bhiram-Ali's case (10). The next cases following the decision are:—Sadagar v. Krishna Chandra Nath (32), Majed Hossein v. Raghubar Chowdhry (33), Gahar Khalifa v. Kasi Mudli (34) and Sita Nath v. Atmaram (35). Uptill the last case the departure was not noticeable. Then followed the case of Ananda Das v. Ratnakar (2), where the objection of the tenant was disallowed and of Sheikh Murullah v. Sheikh Burullah (36), where it was held that the sale of a non transferable occupancy holding was not ipso facto void.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—What duty does the judgment-debtor owe to the decree-holder or the purchaser to make the sale complete?]

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—What principle is there to suggest that omission of objection amounts to representation?]

Of course, my lord, there is the general principle that omission to speak amounts to sufficient representation. Then I come to the next cases reported as Dwarkanath v. Tarini Sankar (4), Samiruddin Munshi v. Benga Sheikh (37) and Shukuruddin Chowdhury v. Rani Hemangini Debi (3).

[CHAITERJEE, J.—Why should the consent of the entire body of landlords be necessary?]

Experience shows that the consent of the landlords is necessary to validate the sale. The next cases following the decision in Dayamoyi's case (6) are Badrannessa Choudhrani v. Alam Gazi (38), Narayani v. Nabin Chandra (7), Ramsundar Karmokar v. Lochan (39), Swarnomoyi v. Adu (40), Bipin Chandra Barua v. Jagat Chandra Nath (41) and Macpherson v. Debi Bhushan (1). In the last case they lay down that the consent of both the landlord and the tenant is necessary in cases of execution sale.

[CHAUDHURI, J.—How is that possible under any process of law?]

That is what has been laid down. That practically concludes my fourth point. The following cases bear on the question of estoppel. Ambica Nath Acharjee v. Aditya Nath (42), Bhagirath Changa v. Sheikh Hafiz uddin (43), Ayenuddin Nasya v. Srish Chandra Banerji (44), Hari Das Bairagi v. Udoy Chandra Das (29), Haro Chandra v. Umesh Chandra (45), Amulya Ratan v. Tarini Nath Dey (46) and Umesh Chandra Dutta v. Joy Nath Das (47).

[CHAUDHURI, J.—Is the word 'estoppel' of any value?]

The law has been codified in sections 115 and 116 of the Indian Evidence Act on the point. The other case is Agarjan Bibi v. Panaulla (5). The doctrine, as I understand it, is that the transfer is operative against all persons except the landlord. The transfer, therefore, is not altogether void but voidable, as otherwise the doctrine would not apply. Refers to Mohori Bibi v. Dharmodas Ghose (48), Beni Pershad Kceri v. Dudhnath Roy (49). This question was mooted in Kebati Mohan Das v. Ahmed Khan (50), Sumsuddin v. Abdul Hossein (51). There have been cases in other countries where the Legislature has imposed a restriction upon the right of a lessee to assign or sublet. Refers to Teiffani's Landlord and Tenant at pages 948, 939.

There remains one other point. Even assuming that the right of occupancy was a personal right, in the sense that it cannot be transferred, under Act X of 1859, that is not so under the Bengal Tenancy Act. Refers to sections 19, 20, 21, 85, 136, 65 and 73. Under the old Act the right could only be acquired by a tenant when he had held the land for more than 12 years, but under the present Act a settled ryot of the village can acquire it over a piece of land which he may have held for not more than a day. Lastly I will refer to the provisions of section 178 (3) under which a tenant cannot contract away his rights, which could be done under section 7 of the old Act. Refers to Tagore Law Lectures (1895), 103. I submit the Full Bench case ought to be modified as indicated.

Babu Ramesh Chandra Sen, for the Respondent.—The question relates to the particular customs of the country. This cannot be decided under general principles of law except in so far as the Statutes have altered the customs. The customs have been recorded in the proceedings at the time of the Permanent Settlement, the judicial decisions and treatises. The right of occupancy is not a new creation of the Legislature. This right was a customary right originally enjoyed by the resident ryots or khudkast ryots. The nature of the right has not been changed but the mode of enjoyment and the persons entitled thereto have been affected. Act X of 1859 introduced the limitation of 12 years for the acquisition of the right. Refers to section 15 (7) of Regulation VII of 1799. These rights of the cultivators were not affected by the Permanent Settlement.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—Where do we find about the status of the cultivating ryot before the Permanent Settlement?]

If we deduce the law of occupancy from the Act X of 1859 logically, then we shall be forced to admit that it is merely a personal right which is inalienable. I would show that before the passing of the Bengal Tenancy Act the right could not be sold even in execution of decrees. Then the Bengal Tenancy Act enacted section 65 giving a wider right to the ryot. The Courts have deviated from the strict principle that it is a personal right. To support that long series of cases the Full Bench case upheld those rulings.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—Do you want us to examine the status of the ryots from the earliest times?]

No. I want to begin from the great rentcase reported as Thakooranee Dossee v. Bisheshur (18) to show that the right is customary. The right is quite independent of the landlord. The origin of the tenancy is not traceable from the record. My rights are independent of the Zemindar because I reside in the village. Even if I am a new tenant, the rights of the khudkast ryot have been conferred upon me.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG., C. J.—You want to ignore the Bengal Tenancy Act. Look at section 5 of the Act.]

The Bengal Tenancy Act does not profess to create new rights. Refers to section 20.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—What class of tenents do you belong to?]

Occupancy ryot. Reads section 21. The Statute does not define the right of occupancy.

I shall not go beyond the Fifth Report to trace the origin of the right. Rights in the tenant were recognised in Regulation I of 1793. Refers to Harrington's Analysis, Volume III, page 398-9; 433-4; 437-8; 460; Fifth Report, Appendix I; Shore's Minute, dated 5th June, paragraph 383 (new Edition, Volume II, page 83). I maintain that to be strictly logical the right is a personal right. I would ask you not to disturb the long series of rulings that the occupancy holding cannot be sold at an execution sale. So far as the landlord is concerned, his right has been placed on abandonment. The Bengal Tenancy Act has not altered the character of the occupancy right. Only cases have brought about some change with the rules of evidence. Refers to the Fifth Report, Appendix V, paragragh 15, page 479, dated 8th December 1789; Field's Introduction to the Land Laws, page 29, § 27, foot-note; Baden Powell's Land Systems of British India, Volume I, 215, paragraph 2; Regulation VII of 1799, section 15 (7). The case of Baboo Prosonokoomar Tagore v. Rammohun Doss (17) did not lay down that the occupany holding was not saleable. It shows that the purchaser got nothing. There were two classes of tenures, transferable and non-transferable. Refers to Volume II, Construction No. 890 (1834), issued by the Bengal Sudder Dewani Adalat. There the right and interest of a jotedar was held to be saleable if the landlord did not object. Refers to Volume II, Construction No. 720, page 47 (1832). A raiyat holding a raiyati interest under a lakheraj. Now the holding is to be valued if it is put to sale. When the interest is incapable of money value, the value put by the raiyat is to be taken. The right of a khudkast raiyat is not transferable. There is no qualification as to non-transferability. I refer to these for the purpose of showing that there are interests which are not transferable. Nothing is said as to the character of the jote. In certain Districts khudkast ryots are transferable, in others they are not so. In Construction No. 890 the construction of a resident ryot does not appear. What the effect would be if the ryot himself objected to is not given. There is another Construction No. 1205, Volume III, dated 1839, page 46, paragraph 4. In this the opinion given in 1832 was re-affirmed in 1839. The other side said that by non-transferable occupancy holding is meant that it is transferable at the instance of the landlord and is not saleable at all. If a tenant does transfer and the landlord accepts money from the transferee, then both parties are precluded from questioning the validity of the transfer. Their Lordships in realising the necessity of the case have formulated the proposition of law in Dayamoyi's case (6). The assumption is that it is not saleable. Refers to Moulvee Ubdoollah v. Rumzoo Dye (52). In this case the transfer had been recognised by the landlord. I refer to this case for showing that it depends upon the value of the holding. Refers to Regulation VIII of 1819, sections 5 and 7. There the landlords were given the right to object to the transfers unless certain things are complied with. I submit there is no express legislation but the right of the landlord to object to the sale is given by the customs of the country. Refers to Koonjo Behares Roy v. Kaminee Soondaree Debia (53) and Tirthanund v. Mutty Lall (54). They show transferable tenures require registration. Landlord's consent to transfer is necessary. In Tirthanund v. Mutty Lall (54) the tenants transferred the holding peicemeal and the landlord claimed khas possession.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—That is a case of sub-division.]

My submission is that these questions should be decided with reference to the nature of the holding. The right of occupancy which used to be enjoyed before Act X of 1859 was enjoyed by resident cultivators. By the very act of sale the right would be destroyed. The right of a resident cultivator to be held at a sale in execution of a decree is in the very nature inconsistent with the idea. In the famous case of Thakoorance Dossee v. Bisheshur (18) it was held that the right of the resident cultivator could not be enjoyed by non resident cultivators. Then the whole law of occupancy was discussed.

(52) 7 Sel. Rep. 370; 8 Ind. Dec. (o. s.) 281.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—Are you maintaining the proposition that occupancy rights are not saleable?]

I submit that occupancy holdings are not saleable at all. If it is sold the parties could be precluded from questioning it. Refers to Basarat Mandal v. Sabulla Mandal (55). Originally the custom was that the rights were to be enjoyed by the heirs. Sir Barnes Peacock doubted whether it is heritable. It is not a personal right. In Dayamoyi's case (6) their Lordships use the word "operative," they do not say that the legal title passes. Refers to sections 3, 15, 6, and 7 of Act X of 1859. Section 27 speaks of sales of under-tenures which are by custom transferable. But in the case of occupancy ryots the provision is not sale but ejectment. Refers to section 105 of Act X of 1859. These provisions were reproduced in Act VIII of 1869. Reads section 78 of Act X. Under Act X of 1859 the holding of an occupancy ryot could not be sold in execution of a decree. Sections 65 and 66 of the Bengal Tenancy Act show the intention of the Legislature to afford greater and greater protection to the ryots. Refers to Ajodhya Pershad v. Imam Bandi Begum (9), Bibee Suhodra v. Maxwell Smith (24), Nurendro Narain Roy v. Ishan Chunder Sen (25). The landlord continued to accept rent from the original tenant. The learned Chief Justice in his judgment speaks of the nature of the tenure. It is placed as a general proposition. Of course the reference was with regard to the particular facts of the case. The case in Taramonee Dassee v. Birressur (8) has been expressely overruled in that case. Refers to Bibee Suhodra v. Maxwell Smith (24). The right of a cultivating ryot is not transferable. There is mentioned for the first time the possibility of estoppel arising.

[CHAUDHURI, J.—How far does the case of Bibee Suhodra v. Maxwell Smith (24) help you?]

The grounds upon which that decision is based are that the holding is not transferable. The Judges there go so far as to indicate that the defendant has no right. The tenant can come back and claim the land. All these cases in Weekly Reporter Series are cases where the ryots voluntarily transferred the holdings. Refers to Nurendro Narain Roy v. Ishan Chunder Sen (25). In this case the tenant was recognised as a ryot and rent was accepted from him. Your Lordships have to consider whether any change has been introduced by the Bengal Tenancy Act. If a ryot does transfer and the landlord accepts rent from the transferee, then he is precluded from treating the successor as a trespasser. The transferee may have the right of occupancy on consent of the landlord. The Bengal Tenancy Act has made no change at all.

Section 5 of the Bengal Tenancy Act treats of ryots. Section 20 (3) relates to occupancy ryots. If a person transfers his holding before 12 years, then these two cannot together acquire the status of a settled ryot. I submit that would not be so. A ryot in order to acquire the right of occupancy must cultivate for 12 years. The only persons who can tack that period are his heirs. That is the reason for inserting clause (3).

The question before you now was raised in Bhiram Ali's case (10) and some other later cases. The reference to the personal nature of the right of occupancy in that case shows that the right is not transferable. So far as voluntary transfers are concerned, I confess they are bound by the doctrine of estoppel.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—You mean to say then that an involuntary sale rests on acquiescence?]

Yes, my Lord. Refers to section 60 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—That section makes certain things absolutely untransferable.]

If those things are as a matter of fact sold and the purchaser comes to take possession of them, I submit he would be estopped on the ground of waiver.

[TEUNON, J.—What is your contention under section 60?]

(55) 2 C. W. N. CCLXXIX; (279) notes.

My contention is that those things cannot be sold in execution of a decree.

[TEUNON, J.—Do you mean to say that a portion of the holding is unsaleable?]

Yes, my Lord.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—Do you rely on clause (c) of section 60?]

Yes, my Lord.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—Do you mean to say that the whole holding is protected?]

Yes. The tenant must object at the time of the execution of the decree. Refers to Pandurang v. Krishnaji (56). There it has been held that a tenant who has allowed the sale of the agricultural implements, etc., cannot subsequently turn round and say that his property was protected under section 60, Civil Procedure Code. Section 60 gives special protection to the agriculturist. The policy of the law is to protect not only cattle and implements but also the land held by the tenant. The holding is protected by custom.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—What custom do you mean?]

The custom of selling without the landlord's consent. The question of landlord's consent arises only after the transfer. "Non-transferable" means "not-transferable." Refers to section 6, Transfer of Property Act.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—No custom is mentioned there.]

It assumes that there are rights of occupancy which are not transferable at all. The question of landlord's consent is not mentioned there. I would now cite of the Weekly Reporter cases which have not been referred to by the other side:—Sreeram Bose v. Bissonath Ghose (57), Moheema Chunder Chuckerbutty v. Poorno Chunder Banerjee (58), Nunjoo Roy v. Mohabeer Pershad (59), Unnopoorna Dossia v. Ooma Churn Doss (60), Shunkurputtee Thakoorain v. Mirza Saifoollah Khan (61), Mahomed Tumeejooddeen Mundul v. Lukhee Narain Dey (62) and Madhu Sudan Sen v. Kamini Kanta Sen (63). You will have either to uphold Dayamoyi's case (6) or change the earlier decisions.

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—In all those cases the landlord was a consenting party?]

First of all it must be a voluntary transfer and then the question of landlord's consent would come in.

CHATTERJEE, J.—If it is not a transferable right, then the landlord's consent cannot give a right to the transferee.]

Yes. I now come to Bhiram Ali's case (10), where the objection of non-transferability was successful. That case has been followed without any disapproval for nearly a quarter of a century. Refers to Durga Charan v. Kali Prasanna (31), Sadagar v. Krishna Chandra Nath (32), Sheikh Jarip v. Ram Kumar Dey (34), Gahar Khalifa v. Kasi Maddi (34), Sita Nath v. Atmaram (35), Sheikh Murullah v. Sheikh Burullah (36), Majed Hossein v. Raghubar Chowdhry (33).

[MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—Can you suggest any principle which could distinguish between a ryot's right to sell and his refusal to have the right of occupancy sold?]

[CHAUDHURI, J.—If a man has got the right to sell, what is it that hinders his right from being sold involuntarily?]

The result is the same whatever phrase is used. Then as to my other cases subsequent to Bhiram Ali's case (10) see Peary Mohan Mukerjee v. Jote Kumar Mookerje (65), Gobinda Nath v. Mohini Mohun Mojumdar (66), Khoda Bakhsh v. Sader Pramanik (67), Deo Saran Lal v. Baleswar Mandal (68) and Agarjon Bibi v. Panaulla (5) The only case against that decision is Ananda Das v. Ratnakar (2). But the Full Bench case has overruled it. The Full Bench has only reiterated what had been laid down in the previous long series of decisions without attempting to distinguish them. The third question referred to the Full Bench is very similar to the point now under consideration When the holding is attached, the question as to its transferability is to be raised and no separate suit should be allowed. Refers to Narayan Anandram v. Gowbai Dhondibu (69).

[CHATTERJEE, J.—How would you get over the case in Ananda Das v. Ratnakar (2)?]

I submit that it is an inconsistent decision which has never been supported, except in Shukuruddin Chowdhury v. Rani Hemangini Debi (3), but with many reservations and qualifications.

[HUDA, J.—Was there a transfer by the tenant at an execution sale?]

Yes. There are a large number of cases after Agarjan Bibi v. Panulla (5): Badrannessa Choudhrani v. Alam Gazi (38), unreported decisions in Miscellaneous Appeal No. 430 of 1915 decided by Fletcher and Richardson, JJ., on 28th November 1916, Second Appeals Nos. 342, 401 of 1917, decided by Teunon and Cuming, JJ., and Miscellaneous Appeal No. 203 of 1913 decided by Chatterjee and Richardson, JJ., on 3rd June 191[illegible]. The English cases and the American authorities cited by the other side do not apply as the present case is governed by customs peculiar to this country.

The cases in Badrannessa Choudhrani v. Alam Gazi (38) and Narayani v. Nabin Chandra (7) follow the Full Bench case. The fact that the landlord is the decree-holder does not place his rights higher, for he is still in the position of a mere creditor. The question is whether the tenant has got the right to sell. Refers to Ramsunder Karmakar v. Lochan (39), Swarnomoyi v. Adu (40). The trend of all the decisions is based on the doctrine that an occupancy holding is not transferable and that a voluntary transfer is binding on the parties on the ground of estoppel. The landlord can re-enter only on abandonment by the tenant, and not when he has accepted and recognised the transferee of the original tenant, as is clear from the decisions already cited. He cannot re-enter when even though there has been a transfer yet no abandonment. Refers Kabil Sardar v Chunder Nath (70), Durga Prosad v. Doula Garee (71), Mathura Mandal v. Ganga Charan Gope (72), Bhupendra Nath Bose v. Bansi Tanti (73). If my learned friend's contention be accepted, then the long series of decisions following Bhiram Ali's case (10) will have to be overruled, which would undoubtedly affect titles acquired under those decisions.

[RICHARDSON, J.—What is the effect of section 25 of the Bengal Tenancy Act?]

That section restricts the landlord's power to eject an occupancy ryot. The Act is silent as to the transferability, which is determined by custom. Refers to section 21. In the present case the judgment-debtor is paying his rent, which would entitle him to continue in his holding. The policy of the law is, I submit, to afford special protection to the cultivating ryots. The Bengal Tenancy Act has not made any change at all. The landlord's position as to non-transferability of the holding is the same as before.

Dr. Mitter, in reply, refers to Nurendro Narain Roy v Ishan Chander Sen (25) and Kripa Nath v. Dyal Chand (74), and Salmond's Jurisprudence, 5th Edition, page 209, as to the meaning of a personal right. The comparison of an occupancy right with profits a prendre is not sound. The position of an occupancy ryot is very much akin to that of Emphyteuta under the Roman Law. Refers to Justinian's Institutes. Occupancy right is property under the law. Refers to sections 25, 26, 178 and 65 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, Deo Saran Lal v. Baleswar Mandal (6[illegible]), section 26 of Act I of 1845, section 37 of Act XI of 1859, section 160 of the Bengal Tenancy Act.

JUDGMENT.

MOOKERJEE, ACTG. C. J.—This is an appeal by a decree-holder from an order made by the Court of Appeal below in affirmance of an order of dismissal passed by the primary Court on an application for execution of a decree. The applicants hold a decree for money against the respondent; and in execution of that decree they have attached his holding. It so happens that the applicants are the landlords of the respondent, who is a raiyat with right of occupancy in the attached holding. His objection is that the holding is not transferable by custom or local usage and cannot be sold in execution of the decree held by the applicants. The Courts below have given effect to this objection and have held that a non-transferable occupancy holding cannot, if the ryot objects, be sold in execution of a decree for money, even though the decree-holder be the sole landlord of the ryot. There is no authority in this Court which explicity affirms this proposition; but the question was raised and decided in Macpherson v. Debi Bhushan (1), where it was ruled that even a sole landlord cannot in execution of a money-decree sell his ryot's occupancy holding if the ryot objects, unless the holding is transferable by custom or local usage. This decision of the Patna High Court is not binding upon this Court as an authority. But it was argued on behalf of the judgment debtor before the Division Bench which heard the present appeal in the first instance, that the view taken in the case just mentioned is a logical deduction from the rule recognised in Narayani v. Nabin Chandra (7) as derivable from the propositions enunciated by the Full Bench in Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Ray (6) which, again, it was contended, substantially adopted the principle laid down in Bhiramali v. Gopi Kant (10). On the other hand, it was argued before the Division Bench on behalf of the decree-holder, that a contrary view was deducible from other decisions of this Court which had never been expressly overruled, such as Ananda Das v. Ratnakar (2) and Shukuruddin Chowdhury v. Rani Hemangini Debi (3). In view of this conflict of judicial opinion, the Division Bench has referred the following question for decision by a Full Bench:

"Is the sole landlord of a ryot competent to sell, in execution of a money-decree against the ryot, his occupancy holding, unless the holding is transferable by usage or custom?"

When the case was opened before the Full Bench, it became manifest that the decision in Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy (6) itself might require examination, as, indeed, would be plain from the following sequence of propositions:—

(1) In the absence of custom or local usage to the contrary, a ryoti holding, in which the ryot has only a right of occupancy, is not saleable at the instance of the occupancy ryot or any creditor of his other than his landlord seeking to obtain satisfaction of his decree for arrears of rent. Bhiramali v. Gopi Kant (10).

(2) A judgment-debtor whose occupancy holding, though not transferable by custom or local usage, is sought to be sold in contravention of the above rule, may object to the proposed sale if he is aware of the execution proceeding; otherwise, if a sale takes place, he may object, even after the confirmation of the sale, when possession is delivered to the execution purchaser. Durga Charan v. Kali Prasanna (31).

(3) In transfers, for value, of occupancy holdings, apart from custom or local usage, the transfer is operative (a) as against the ryot, when it is made involuntarily and the ryot with knowledge fails or omits to have the sale set aside, and (b) as against the landlord in all cases in which it is operative against the ryot, provided the landlord has given his previous or subsequent consent. Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy (6).

(4) An occupancy holding which is not saleable by custom or local usage cannot be sold in execution of a decree for money obtained against the ryot, when the ryot objects, even if all the landlords gave their consent to the sale. Narayani v. Nabin Chandra (7).

(5) The sole landlord of a ryot cannot, if the ryot objects, sell his occupancy holding in execution of a money-decree, unless the holding is transferable by custom or local usage Macpherson v. Debi Bhushan (1).

It is indisputable that the appellant before us, in order to succeed, must assail the decision in Bhiramali v. Gopi Kant (10) and also the Full Bench decision in Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy (6), to the extent that it accorded approval to the substance of the principle embodied in that case. In these circumstances this Special Bench has been constituted to consider the question referred, so that we may be free, in accordance with the rules of the Court, to examine the correctness of the Full Bench decision in Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy (6), in so far as it affects the present matter. Consequently, as might have been anticipated the elaborate arguments addressed to us on the question of the nature and incidents of occupancy right have centered round the decision in Bhiramali v. Gopi Kant (10). On the one hand, it has been maintained by the decree-holder that it departed on erroneous grounds from what was, at the time, really well settled law; it has been contended, on the other hand, that it merely gave effect to what had been the accepted view on the subject from the date of the Permanent Settlement.

The earliest judicial pronouncement on the subject of transferability of a ryoti holding, which we have been able to trace, is contained in Construction No. 890, dated the 11th July 1834, issued by the Bengal Sudder Dewani Adawlut, in the case of Neelkanth Roy v. Kosheenath Ghose. The petitioner requested "to know whether the jote jama of the latter (defendant) can be disposed of in satisfaction of a decree obtained against him for Rs. 782 under Regulation IV of 1793" (Sudder Diary, 1834, page 268). The construction was addressed to the Judge of Zillah Jessore who had forwarded the petition and is in the following terms:

"I am directed by the Court to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 24th ultimo and its enclosure requesting the Court's opinion as to the liability of the jote jama of a ryot to be sold in execution of a money decree, provided the Zemindar do not object to the measure.

2. In reply, I am directed to inform you that the Court are of opinion that the rights and interests of the jotedar may be sold in satisfaction of a decre."

It is important to bear in mind that this construction was not a casual expression of opinion by the Sudder Dewani Adawlut, but was a deliberate determination upon a question of law in the performance of statutory duty imposed on the Judges. The framers of the Bengal Regulations, in their desire to secure certainty and uniformity in the administration of the law, took appropriate measures which may perhaps have been forgotten at this distance of time and may be usefully recalled here. Regulation XLI of 1793, passed on the 1st May 1793, embodied rules for the construction of the Regulations. Regulation X of 1796, passed on the 7th October 1796, was framed for the guidance of the Courts of Justice in cases of a difference of opinion on the meaning and construction of the Regulations. Section 2 of this Regulation authorised Zillah and City Judges and Magistrates to state objections to precepts of the Provincial Courts or Courts of Circuit, if they considered such precepts to be contrary to or unwarranted by the Regulations. If the Provincial Courts or Courts of Circuit, in reply to the objections, confirmed the first precept in whole or in part, the Zillah or City Judge or Magistrate was bound to comply with the requisition. But the Zillah or City Judge or Magistrate was at liberty to request a reference to the Sudder Dewani or Nizamut Adawlut according as the case in question related to the Civil or Criminal department. Section 3 next provided that, on such reference, the determination of the Sudder Dewani or Nizamut Adawlut was to be held final and conclusive. Section 4 then laid down that if the Sudder Court should consider that the matter was doubtful or that the Regulations did not sufficiently provide for the case submitted for their decision, the Judges should report the matter to the Governor-General in Council, so that a new Regulation might be framed in explanation of the doubt or to cover cases of that description. In performance of the important duty thus imposed on the Sudder Courts, the Judges, from time to time, issued constructions which were held final and conclusive by all subordinate Courts. The first of these constructions was issued on the 3rd May 1798, and so far as information is now available, the last (No. 1415) on the 19th July 1847. By Regulation VI of 1831, a Sudder Dewani and Nizamut Adawlut was established at Allahabad for the Western Provinces with effect from 1st January 1832, and we find it frequently noted, with regard to individual constructions issued thereafter by the Calcutta Court or by the Western Court, respectively, that the Western Court or the Calcutta Court, as the case might be, concurred in the construction. Collections of these constructions were from time to time issued under the authority of Government; the standard edition is that in three volumes published during 1833—1844; a later edition in two volumes was brought out by Mr. C. T. Buckland in 1855.

The circumstances under which the question raised by the Judge of Jessore came to be decided by the Sudder Court may now be briefly stated. The rules of procedure applicable to civil suits were embodied in Regulation IV of 1793 as subsequently modified by Regulation XXVI of 1814. Section 7 of Regulation IV of 1793 prescribed the mode of execution of decrees in the following terms:

"The Court is then to cause the decrees to be executed, if it be for a Zamindary, independent or dependent Taluk, or other estate or real property, by causing possession of the property to be delivered to the person to whom it may be decreed; if it be for personal property or a sum of money, by causing the specific thing to be delivered or the value of it, or the sum of money decreed, to be levied by public sale by auction of a sufficient portion, or if requisite for the satisfaction of the decree, the whole of the lands, houses, and all the other effects, either real or personal, belonging to the party against whom the judgment may have been given, or by the attachment of his person or where it may be necessary, both by the sale of his property and effects, and the attachment of his person."

This provision was left unaffected by clause 7 of section 15 of Regulation XXVI of 1814, which provided that the Court, after causing the purport of the petition for execution to be compared with the decree contained in the original record of the suit, should proceed to execute the same in conformity with the provisions which were then in force or which might thereafter be enacted. Consequently, under section 7 of Regulation IV of 1793 the decree-holder might, prima facie, in execution of a decree for money against a ryot with right of occupancy, levy the judgment debt by public sale by auction of a sufficient portion or the whole of the lands, houses and all other effects, either real or personal, belonging to the ryot. A difficulty, however, might be created by the reason of the phraseology used in clause 7 of section 15 of Regulation VII of 1799, which described a lease holder or other tenant as "having a right of occupancy only so long as a certain rent or a rent determinable on certain principles according to local rates or usages be paid, without any right of property or transferable possession". No doubt, Regulation VII of 1799 was framed, not with a view to define the status of tenants of various degrees, but only to provide rules so as to enable proprietors and farmers of land to realise their rents with punctuality: still the use of the expressions just mentioned might well create a doubt and suggest the question, whether a tenant having a right of occupancy was "without a right of property or transferable possession" absolutely or only in relation to his landlord who could treat the defaulting tenure itself as forfeited by a breach of the condition for due payment of rent, no matter who might be in actual occupation.

The phraseology used in Regulation VII of 1799 is similar to that employed by well-known writers of that generation on the subject of the land tenures of the Presidency of Bengal. Thus in paragraph 383 of a Minute recorded by Sir John Shore on the 18th June 1789, respecting the proposed permanent settlement of the lands in the Bengal Provinces, we find the following statement.

"It is, however, generally understood that the ryots by long occupancy acquire a right of possession in the soil and are not subject to be removed; but this does not authorise them to sell or mortgage it, and it is, so far, distinct from a right of property. This, like all other rights under a despotic or varying form of Government, is precarious" (Fifth Report edited by Firminger, Volume II, page 84).

But there can be little doubt that, as stated by Sir John Shore himself in paragraph 15 of another Minute recorded on the 8th December 1789 "the most cursory observation shows the situation of things in the country to be singularly confused. The relation of a Zemindar to the Government and of a ryot to the Zemindar is neither that of a properietor nor a vassal, but a compound of both; the former performs acts of authority unconnected with proprietary right; the latter has rights without real property; and the property of the one and rights of the other are in a great measure held at discretion." Sir John Harrington in his Analysis of the Bengal Regulations (Volume III, pages 419—463) deals with the rights of the under tenants and quotes largely from the Minute of Sir John Shore. There is one passage which may be usefully reproduced here from paragraphs 406 and 407 of the Minute dated 18th June 1789 (Fifth Report, Volume II, page 87):—

"406. Pattas to the khudkasht ryots, or those who cultivate the land of the village where they reside, are generally given, without any limitation of period; and express that they are to hold the lands, paying the rents from year to year. Hence the right of occupancy originates and it is equally understood as a prescriptive law, that the ryots who hold by this tenure, cannot relinquish any part of the lands in their possession, or change the species of cultivation, without a forfeiture of the right of occupancy which is rarely insisted upon; and the Zemindars demand and exact the difference. I understand also that this right of occupancy is admitted to extend, even to the heirs of those who enjoy it.

"407. Pykaust ryots, or those who cultivate the land of villages where they do not reside, hold their lands upon a more indefinite tenure. The Pattas to them are generally granted with a limitation in point of time: where they deem the terms unfavourable, they repair to some other spot".

It is plain that a distinction was made between ryots who cultivated the lands of the village where they resided and ryots who cultivated the lands of villages where they did not reside; the former alone apparently had a right of occupancy. Whether in those early days, a question ever arose as to the transferability of the tenancy of a resident cultivator, except as between the ryot and his landlord, it is impossible at this distance of time to investigate. No records are known to have been preserved of the proceedings of such Courts as existed before the re establishment of the Sudder Dewani Adawlut in 1793, and the earliest judicial pronouncement on the subject which has been traced is contained in the construction dated the 11th July 1834. The Court at the time consisted of five Judges, Rattray, C. J., Shakespear, Braddon, Robertson and Smyth, JJ., some of whom had been members of the Court for several years and all of whom had considerable experience of judicial administration as covenanted servants of the East India Company. A pronouncement by a Court so composed must obviously carry great weight as to what was understood to be the law at that time.

On behalf of the respondent, it was argued that the construction was intended to lay down a rule applicable only to cases where the jote jama of the ryot was transferable by custom. There is no force in this contention, for the manifest reason that it would be wholly superfluous to lay down a rule that a transferable jote jama could be sold in execution provided the Zemindar did not object. The scope and effect of the construction are, however, placed beyond all doubt by a Minute which was recorded by Rattray, C. J., Tucker, Reid and Dick, JJ., on the 5th December 1845 on a reference by the Sudder Dewani Adawlut of the North Western Provinces. The Court stated that "the phrase rights and interests was purposely employed, conveying that the rights and interests of a jotedar could be sold without determining of what they consisted, a question which could be properly disposed of only by regular suit in the Civil Courts." The Court thus left any case in which the question might arise to depend upon the evidence adduced in support of either the assertion or the denial of the existence of such saleable rights and interests. The Court was, as might be anticipated, fully aware that only certain tenancies were transferable, for they proceeded to add: "it is acknowledged by the Court that there are in certain districts of Bengal, and more particularly in Jessore, Faridpur and Rungpore, jote jamas, the proprietors of which have a transferable right in the soil, subject to the payment of rent to the Zemindar. These tenures are saleable for arrears, and any surplus sale proceeds which may remain after satisfying the Zemindar's demand, are paid to the late jotedar. The jama of such a tenure is fixed or variable according to its date being antecedent or subsequent to the Decennial Settlement. These and other points require to be determined in each case, and it cannot be said, therefore, that the employment of the term jotedar implies any specific rights and interests." It will be observed that Rattray, C. J., was a party to the construction of the 11th July 1834 as also to the explanatory memorandum of the 5th December 1845. There can, in our opinion, be no room for doubt that the construction was intended to apply to all tenancies, transferable or non-transferable. We may add that the construction which was adopted by the Western Court on the 5th September 1834 was repealed in the North-Western Provinces (Taylor, Thompson and Davidson, JJ.) on the 1st January 1846; but it continued to be in full operation within the jurisdiction of the Bengal Sudder Dewani Adawlut.

This construction was treated as good law in the case of Baboo Prosonokoomar Tagore v. Rammohun Doss (17) decided by a Full Bench of the Sudder Dewani Adawlut (Sir R. Barlow, C. J., Raikes and Colvin, JJ.) on the 11th January 1855. In that case, the transferee of a ryot sued to recover possession of a jote from the landlord. The landlord contended that such sale without his permission was not good. The primary Court overruled the objection and decreed the suit. The lower Appellate Court confirmed this decree. On second appeal to the Sudder Court, the question was raised, whether a ryot could sell his jote to a third party without permission of the Zemindar. On behalf of the transferee of the jote reliance was placed upon construction No. 890. The Court observed that the case before them was that of a private purchaser, while the construction related to the case of a purchaser at an execution sale, and then pointed out that the construction provides that the permission of the Zemindar to the sale of the jote in execution of decree must be obtained. The Court accordingly held that the plaintiff's claim to possession without permission of the Zemindar was invalid, and added:

"He bought as he thought something; the principle caveat emptor strictly applies and it was for him to look to the certainty of getting a consideration for his purchase money. The party whom he succeeded had no equivalent to offer; he had merely a right of occupancy so long as he paid his rents; failing to do so, either from inability or from unwillingness, the possession returned to the proprietor, the contract between him and his ryot being no longer in force. Such is the custom of the country and none but the tenures referred to in Act I of 1845 (Revenue Sale Law, section 26) or in cases where a bonus has been given, thereby creating in the ryot a right in the property to that extent, are considered tenures transferable by the ryot. In support of this opinion, reference may be had to that of Harrington; see pages 434 and 450 of his Analysis, Volume III."

The combined effect of the construction in the case of Neelkanth Roy v. Kasheenath Ghose and of the decision in Baboo Prosonokoomar Tagore v. Rammohun Doss (17) thus was that the jote jama of a ryot could be sold in execution of a money-decree provided the Zemindar did not object to the measure, and a private alienation thereof by the ryot was invalid against the Zemindar if made without his permission. Such was the law as understood and administered by the Sudder Dewani Adawlut when Act X of 1859 was placed on the Statute book; the restraint on the ryot against the alienation of his land, whether voluntary or involuntary, was deemed to be for the benefit of his landlord, and the fetter might be removed by the assent of the landlord. The theory that such restraint might be imposed for the benefit of the ryot himself, to protect him against his own improvidence, had not yet been propounded.

Before we proceed to consider the law as administered under Act X of 1859, reference may be made to a curious case, Thakoee Sarap v. Smoult (75), which was decided by the Supreme Court in 1843. That was action of trespass, vi et armis, brought against the Sheriff of Calcutta for wrongful execution with regard to properties in the District of Dacca. The property was in the actual occupation of the ryots, while the action was instituted by the Talukdar. The Counsel for the defendant argued that the Talukdars were not owners of the land, but were mere Government collectors who framed the revenues of the Taluk, making the most of them from the ryot and paying a fixed income to the Government. The Counsel for the plaintiff argued that the Talukdar was the party in immediate possession of the land, that the ryot had no interest therein but was a mere cultivator of the soil; but Counsel also added that the ryot had an hereditary interest independent of both Talukdar and Government, neither of whom could displace him so long as he paid his rent. Sir Lawrence Peel, C. J., with the concurrence of Sir John Grant and Sir Henry Seton, JJ., non suited the plaintiff and observed: "the ryot here has a better tenure than a lessee in England and one not nearly so precarious as that of the tenant-at-will. Case was the proper remedy in this instance, for though the Zemindar has no reversionary interest he has an interest which has been injured by the tortious act of the defendant." There was manifestly much uncertainty as to the true status of the ryot and his relation to the Zemindar in those days, and the object of the Legislature was to remove these doubts, as far as practicable, by the provisions of a new and comprehensive measure.

In the Bill which subsequently became Act X of 1859, an attempt was made, for the first time, by the Legislature to define the right of occupancy enjoyed by a ryot. It was recited in the statement of objects and reasons, dated the 10th October 1857, that the Regulation recognised the right of all resident ryots to the occupancy of the lands cultivated by them so long as they paid the established rent. The Bill consequently contained a declaration that all resident ryots or cultivators had a right of occupancy in the lands held or cultivated by them so long as they paid the rents legally demandable from them. Clause 4 of the Bill was framed in the following terms:

"Every resident Raiyat and cultivator has a right of occupancy in the land held or cultivated by him, whether it be held under Patta or not, so long as he pays the rent payable on account of the same: but this rule does not apply to khamar, neej ote or seer land belonging to the proprietor of the estate or tenure and leased for a term or year by year to a resident cultivator, nor (as respects the actual cultivator) to lands sublet to a resident cultivator by a ryot having a right of occupancy."

When, however, the Bill was passed into law, this provision had become materially altered and had been transformed into what is familiar to us as section 6 of Act X of 1859:

"Every Raiyat, who has cultivated, or held land for a period of 12 years, has a right of occupancy in the land so cultivated or held by him, whether it be held under Patta or not, so long as he pays the rent payable on account of the same; but this rule does not apply to khamar, neej jote, seer land belonging to the proprietor of the estate or tenure and let by him on lease for a term or year by year nor (as respects the actual cultivator) to lands sublet for a term or year by year by a Raiyat having a right of occupancy. The holding of the father or other person from whom a Raiyat inherits shall be deemed to be the holding of the ryot within the meaning of this section."

It is plain on a comparison of the clause in the Bill as introduced with the section as finally enacted that the two differ on fundamental points, namely, first, the right of occupancy was recognised as attainable by all ryots including non-resident ryots; secondly, such right could be acquired by continuous cultivation for a period of twelve year; thirdly, the right, while in process of growth, was transmissible by inheritance; and fourthly, there was no distinction made between resident and non-resident cultivators in respect of the private lands of the proprietor. Whether the clause in its original form or the section in its final shape represented the pre existing law on the subject has been matter of controversy, and there has been a marked divergence of judicial opinion on the subject as will appear from an examination of the judgment of Sir Barnes Peacock, C. J., in Hills v. Ishore Ghose (76) Hills v. Ishore Ghose (77) and Ishore Ghose v. Hills (78) and the judgments of Mr. Justice Trevor in Thakooranee Dossee v.

Bisheshur (18), which was heard by the Full Court and overruled the decision in Hills v. Ishore Ghose (78). We are not now concerned with the question which was considered by the Full Court, namely, the liability to enhancement of the rent of an occupancy ryot. But the remarkable fact remains that although the question of the status of an occupancy ryot was considered by the Legislature in 1859, no attempt was made to give an exhaustive enumeration of the incidents of the tenancy and nothing was stated about transferability or even about heritability. The papers relating to the passing of Act X of 1859 as also those relating to the working of the Act were published by the Government of India in 1863. Amongst the numerous opinions recorded at the time by judicial and administrative officers as also by the Chief Justice and Judges of this Court, no trace can be found of a discussion of the question of transferability, though there are casual suggestions for the "compulsory enfranchisement of the restricted tenure of occupancy ryots" by payment of a prescribed fee to the Zemindar. When we turn to the judicial decisions, we find an almost equal paucity of authorities on the question of the transferability of occupancy holdings. As will presently be seen, whenever the question was raised, the validity of the transfer was challenged by the landlord or by a person claiming as his representative. The rule enunciated by the Sudder Court as to involuntary alienations in 1834 and as to voluntary alienations in 1855 does not appear to have been controverted in any reported decision. This is not a matter for surprise. Act X of 1859 made the status of an occupancy ryot more certain and less precarious than it was under the Regulations. Further protection was accorded to the ryot against various means of oppression to which Zemindars were accustomed to have recourse under Regultion VII of 1799, and although the ryot still continued liable to forfeit his tenancy for non-payment of rent, he could not be ejected otherwise than in execution of a decree or order under the provisions of the Act (section 21). It is not necessary for our present purpose to attempt a complete enumeration of all the advantages conferred on the ryot by the legislation of 1859; it is sufficient to state that the marked improvement in the status of the ryot steadily tended to weaken the theory, if it ever prevailed, that the right of occupancy was a purely personal right.

Amongst judicial decisions pronounced during the operation of Act X of 1859 or Act VIII of 1869 B. C. (which transferred the jurisdiction to determine disputes between landlords and tenants from the Revenue Courts to the Civil Courts), the most important are two Full Bench cases, namely, Ajoodhya Pershad v. Imam Bandi Begum (9), Nurendro Narain Roy v. Ishan Chunder Sen (25). In the first case, Ajoodhya Pershad v. Imam Bandi Begum (9), the occupancy ryot transferred his holding without the consent of his landlord. The landlord sued the ryot for arrears of enhanced rent after service of the prescribed notice. The transferee intervened. The District Judge decreed the claim against the original tenant. The tenant appealed and contended, on the authority of the decision in Taramonee Dassee v. Birressur (8), that he had divested himself of all liability for rent by the transfer of his holding. The Division Bench referred the following point for the decision of a Full Bench: "Whether a tenure, not originally transferable without the consent of the landlord, become so, because the tenant had obtained a prescriptive right of occupancy." The Full Bench answered the question in the negative. Sir Barnes Peacock, C. J., held there was nothing in section 6 of Act X of 1859 which showed that it was the intention of the Legislature to alter the nature of a jote and to convert a non-transferable jote into a transferable one merely because a ryot who held it for twelve years had thereby gained a right of occupancy. Sir Barnes Peacock also added an expression of his doubt, whether a right of occupancy actually gained under section 6 was necessarily heritable. This doubt, as we know, has not been shared by later Judges. In the second case, Nurendro Narain Roy v. Ishan Chunder Sen (25), the suit was instituted by a purchaser of a Zemindari at a sale for arrears of Government revenue. The purchaser sought to eject the defendant who claimed to be a transferee of an occupancy holding. The question arose, whether the defendant had a protected interest as a "ryot having a right of occupancy" within the meaning of the proviso to section 37 of Act XI of 1859. His purchase of the occupancy holding on the 5th December 1859 had been recognised by the then Zemindar who had accepted him as his tenant. On behalf of the plaintiff, who had purchased the Zemindari on the 6th May 1871, it was argued that as the defendant had not himself been in occupation for twelve years from the 5th December 1859 to the 6th May 1871, he had not acquired the status of an occupancy ryot under section 6 of Act X of 1859. The question thus arose, whether the possession of the transferee could be added to the possession of the transferor who at the date of the transfer had acquired a right of occupancy. Sir Richard Couch, C. J., held that the answer to the question depended solely on the terms of section 6 of Act VIII of 1869 B. C., which had replaced section 6 of Act X of 1859. On the construction of that section it was ruled that the right of occupancy can be enjoyed only by the person who holds or cultivates and pays rent and has done so for a period of twelve years; in other words, the section secures to a ryot, who has cultivated or held for twelve years, a continuance of his cultivation or holding so long as he pays the rent. In support of this construction reliance was placed upon the proviso at the end of the section by which the holding of the person from whom the ryot inherits is deemed the holding of the ryot, indicating that except in that particular case, the holding must be entirely by the person who claims the right. We are not unmindful that there are expressions in the judgment of Sir Richard Couch, C. J., to the effect that a ryot having a right of occupancy has a "right not being one which can be transferred to some other person", "a right to be enjoyed only by the person who holds or cultivates and pays the rent and has done so for a period of twelve years," and not "a right which he might, having acquired it, transfer or make use of as a subject of property." But the generality of these expressions would be misleading, if we overlooked that they were used in a case where the question of transferability was raised by the Zemindar. This circumstance, indeed, is emphasised by Sir Richard Couch when he speaks of the Bengal Rent Act as "a law which imposes a restriction upon the proprietary right of the Zemindar or landlord" and adds that "a ryot cannot claim under it (that is, claim against his landlord) anything more than the words clearly give to him; there are not here, in my opinion, words of so doubtful a meaning that we should consider whether it would be just or equitable that the ryot should have the power to transfer." Similar observations apply to the judgment of Mr. Justice Phear, who thought that the right of occupancy was rather of the nature of a personal privilege than a substantive proprietary right; but this statement must be taken with what immediately follows:—

"I think that there can be no right of occupancy under the terms of this section other than in a person who is cultivating or holding the land as a ryot in the situation which is mentioned in this section; and that, therefore, a person can only have this right who is actually cultivating or holding the land, and then only if he has cultivated or held the land as a ryot for a period of twelve years, according to the rule for estimating that time which is prescribed in the section; and that rule is that only the actual cultivation or holding of the person who sets up the right, and in the case where he has taken the cultivation or the holding of the land by inheritance from a predecessor, then, constructively, the cultivating or holding of that predecessor counts. The section does not give to any one other than the person who has actually held or cultivated land for the period of twelve years either by himself alone, or by himself and his predecessor from whom he has taken by inheritance, together, the right of occupation which is the subject of the section. And if this be so, then it seems to be plain upon the facts which the reference brings before us that Ishan Chandra Sen, the defendant in the case, has not a right of occupancy in the land which is subject of suit, because he had himself only cultivated or held it as a ryot for a period of a little more than eleven years, and the person who preceded him in the cultivation or holding thereof was not one from whom he took it by inheritance. His predecessor in the cultivation or holding was Krishna

Das, from whom he took by purchase. In that state of things he is not entitled by the words of section 6 to add any years of Krishna Das's holding to the years of his own holding."

The scope of this decision and of the grounds therefor, as we shall see later, has been sometimes misunderstood. This has been due perhaps in some measure to the very broad general statement which forms the headnote to the report in the Weekly Reporter: "a right of occupancy which a ryot has under Act VIII B. C. of 1869, section 6, is not transferable. When such ryot sells his holding his right of occupancy ceases, and it cannot protect the purchaser against ejectment." It is not necessary for us to examine in detail the earlier decisions which are mentioned in the order of reference to the Full Bench by Markby and Birch, JJ. But reference must be made to the judgment of Mr. Justice Phear in Bibee Suhodra v. Maxwell Smith (24) where a comparison is instituted between a right of occupancy and a profit a prendre, and the royt's interest is described as the dominant right and the Zemindar's the servient right. Analogies of this description are not likely to be of much assistance in the solution of a problem which by itself is not wholly free from complexity and confusion. Upon an examination of the facts of all the decisions on the question of transferability of occupancy holdings which preceded the decision of the Full Bench and which have been brought to our notice, we find that the validity of the transfer has been challenged only by the Zemindar or by a person claiming through or under him; and this important circumstananse must be carefully borne in mind when we meet with general expressions like "a right of occupancy cannot be transferred" in cases between landlords and tenants; as an instance, we may mention the judgment of the Judicial Committee delivered by Sir Richard Couch in the case of Chandrabati v. Harrington (23); see also the judgment of Phear, J., in Bootee Singh v. Moorut Singh (79). Our attention has not been drawn to a single instance where, under Act X of 1859 or Act VIII of 1869, B. C., the contention was advanced on behalf of the ryot that his holding was not transferable even with the assent of the landlord. What was understood to be the law in this respect as administered by the Sudder Dewani Adawlut before Act X of 1859 was apparently also taken to be the law under Act X of 1859 and under Act VIII of 1869 B. C. This is shown by the following extract from the judgment of Prinsep and Ghose, JJ., in Palakdhari Rai v. Manners (26). delivered on the 3rd September 1895:—

"It is useful that we should state shortly the law relating to the transfer of rights of occupancy. These rights were first expressly declared by Act X of 1859 for, although up to that time tenant right had no doubt been recognised by the Courts, still it was not clearly defined or indeed held to exist in the terms expressed by Act X of 1859. The only person concerned in the transfer of a tenant's holding was naturally the landlord Zemindar, and if his consent had been obtained, or if he acquiesced in the transfer the transaction came into effect. But his consent was often withheld or not even asked for, and the Courts were soon called upon to determine the validity of such transfers. As a rule, the consent of the landlord was necessary. It was even doubted, see per Peacock, C. J., in Ajoodhya Pershad v. Imam Bandi Begum (9), whether a holding with rights of occupancy was heritable. But it was afterwards held that the consent of the landlord was not necessary to render a transfer valid if it was in accordance with a custom of the country or the locality. It will be observed, however, that in none of the cases on this subject was any reference made to a transfer in accordance with usage. The Courts held that the custom of the country or the locality alone conferred the right of transfer of such holdings without the consent of the landlord. Sales of such holdings in execution of decrees against such tenants used occasionally to be held. When they were held at the instance of the landlord as decreeholder, the transfer so effected would be with his consent; but when the sales were in execution of decrees by third parties, the right of transfer without such consent was generally disputed. Bengal Act VIII of 1869, which repealed Act X of 1859 wherever it was brought into operation, did not alter the law in this respect, except in so far that section 6 seemed to recognise a transfer by inheritance of a holding with right of occupancy, and so the law remained until the passing of the Bengal Tenancy Act in 1885."

Such then was understood to be the law before the Bengal Tenancy Act came into operation, and for nearly a dozen years, no one appears to have doubted that in the event of a transfer, voluntary or involuntary, of an occupancy holding not transferable by custom or local usage, the landlord was the only person entitled to dispute the validity of the transfer, if it had been effected without his consent previously taken or assent subsequently obtained. In the case of Bhiram Ali v. Gopi Kant (10), which was decided on the 14th January 1897, it was, however, contended by an occupancy ryot, whose holding had been sold in execution of a decree for money, that the sale was invalid and had not operated to pass any title to the purchaser at the execution sale. This contention prevailed and the proposition was enunciated for the first time that, in the absence of custom or local usage to the contrary, a ryoti holding in which the ryot has only a right of occupancy is not saleable at the instance of the occupancy ryot or any creditor of his, other than his landlord seeking to obtain satisfaction of his decree for arrears of rent. The Court came to the conclusion that ordinarily the only persons interested in impugning the validity of the transfer of an occupancy holding were the occupancy ryot and the landlord, and that though no difficulty could arise in the way of the transfer being given effect to, where, in the event of a voluntary alienation by the ryot, the transferee was accepted by the landlord, the position was wholly different where the transfer had been effected by a compulsory sale at the instance of a creditor of the ryot. This view was supported on three grounds, namely, first, that section 25 of the Bengal Tenancy Act by implication indicates that the Legislature did not intend to make occupancy rights transferable; secondly, that section 65 also by implication indicates that an occupancy holding could be sold, only by the entire body of landlords in execution of a decree for arrears of rent: and, thirdly, that under the law as it stood before the Bengal Tenancy Act a right of occupancy could not be transferred by sale. With all respect for the learned Judges who decided the case of Bhiram Ali v. Gopi Kant (10), we are constrained to hold that none of these grounds is conclusive. In the first place, the Bengal Tenancy Act, as its preamble shows, is intended to amend and consolidate, not the entire law of landlord and tenant but only certain enactments relating to that law, so that, as pointed out in Kripa Sindhu v Annada Sundari Debi (80), it is not a complete Code It nowhere purports to give an exhaustive enumeration of all the incidents of occupancy right. The fact that section 26 makes occupancy right heritable and does not refer to the question of transferability does not consequently justify the inference that the Legislature did not intend to make occupancy right transferable. If speculation were permissible, it might, with some plausibility, be suggested that the Legislature expressly dealt with the question of heritability, as a doubt had been expressed on the point by Sir Barnes Peacock, C. J., in Ajoodhya Pershad v. Imam Bandi Begam (9), and did not think it equally necessary to deal with the question of transferability, as the rulings of the Sudder Dewani Adawlut in 1834 and 1855 had apparently never been called in question. On the other hand, it might also be suggested with equal, if not greater, plausibility that the Legislature dealt with the simpler question of heritability and left alone the more complex problem of transferability. But whatever may be the true reason for the omission, the mere fact of the omission does not with certainty point to the conclusion that the Legislature intended to make occupancy holdings non-transferable. In the second place, section 65 of the Bengal Tenancy Act is of no real assistance in the solution of the question before us. Section 65 enacts that where a tenant is a permanent tenure-holder, a ryot holding at fixed rate or an occupancy ryot, he shall not be liable to ejectment for arrears of rent, but his tenure or holding shall be liable to sale in execution of a decree for the rent thereof and the rent shall be a first charge thereon. The object of this provision was, not to impose a restriction on a sale of the holding by the ryot or at the instance of his execution creditor, but to remove what had been a great hardship on the ryot for nearly a century. The framers of Regulation VII of 1799, in their anxiety to strengthen the hands of the Zemindar, had armed him with authority to realise arrears of rent from tenants by drastic measures which have been deemed characteristic of a semi civilised age. Amongst these remedies were distraint, arrest, forfeiture, powers which could all be exercised in a summary manner. The result was that a valuable holding could be treated as forfeited and the tenant summarily ejected for non-payment, it may be, of a small sum due as arrear of rent. The severity of such methods as these was softened by some of the provisions of Act X of 1859; but it was not till 1885, that the Bengal Tenancy Act provided that an occupancy ryot was not liable to be ejected for non payment of rent. The landlord could bring the holding to sale, with the result that he would thereby realise the arrears from the sale-proceeds while the surplus would be available to the defaulter. Section 65 consequently does not justify the conclusion that an occupancy holding is saleable, only when the landlord seeks to sell it in execution of a decree for arrears of rent thereof. On the other hand, section 65 makes the rent a first charge on the occupancy holding; for this purpose, it is placed in the same category as a permanent tenure and the holding of a ryot at fixed rates which, under section 18, is governed by the same rules of transfer and succession as a permanent tenure. This plainly militates against the theory that an occupancy right is a purely "personal right" or "personal privilege." In the third place, the statement of the law as it stood before the Bengal Tenancy Act is open to valid criticism. The inference drawn from the decision of the Full Bench in Nurendro Narain Roy v. Ishan Chunder Sen (25) is really not justified, as we have seen, by the circumstances of that case. That case arose between a Zemindar and a person who claimed protection from ejectment as the holder of an occupancy right; besides, as Sir Richard Couch, C. J., stated explicity in his judgment and explained again in Kripa Nath v. Dyal Chand (74) the case depended solely on the construction of section 6 of Bengal Act VIII of 1869. The difficulty created by the phraseology of that section, as will presently appear, has been removed by the altered provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act. On the other hand, the attention of the learned Judges does not appear to have been drawn to the rule enunciated by the Sudder Dewani Adawlut in 1834 with regard to involuntary transfers and in 1855 with regard to voluntary alienations —rules which do not appear to have been ever afterwards called in question. Consequently, there is no escape from the conclusion that the grounds of the decision in Bhiram Ali v. Gopi Kant (10), which was in reality a departure from the law as administered for over sixty years, do not stand the test of criticism.

In this connection, it is of fundamental importance to observe that the Bengal Tenancy Act went much further than Act X of 1859 in the way of improvement of the status of the occupancy ryot, and the phraseology used in some of its provisions can hardly be reconciled with the theory that a right of occupancy is a purely personal right. But before we deal with this point, we may explain how the Bengal Tenancy Act has removed the difficulty created by the language of section 6 of Act X of 1859 by the introduction of the notion of "a settled ryot of a village." The status of a settled ryot is thus defined in section 20:—

"(1) Every person who, for a period of twelve years, whether wholly or partly before or after the commencement of this Act, has continuously held as a raiyat land situate in any village, whether under a lease or otherwise, shall be deemed to have become on the expiration of that period a settled raiyat of that village.

(2) A person shall be deemed for the purposes of this section to have continuously held land in a village, notwithstanding that the particular land held by him has been different at different times.

(3) A person shall be deemed for the purposes of this section to have held as a raiyat any land held as a raiyat by a person whose heir he is.

(4) Land held by two or more co-sharers as a raiyati holding shall be deemed for the purposes of this section to have been held as a raiyat by each such co-sharer.

(5) A person shall continue to be a settled raiyat of a village as long as he holds any land as a raiyat in that village and for one year thereafter.

(6) If a raiyat recovers possession of land under section 87, he shall be deemed to have continued to be a settled raiyat, notwithstanding his having been out of possession more than a year.

(7) If, in any proceeding under this Act, it is proved or admitted that a person holds any land as a raiyat, it shall, as between him and the landlord under whom he holds the land, be presumed, for the purposes of this section, until the contrary is proved or admitted, that he has for twelve years continuously held that land or some part of it as a raiyat."

Section 21, sub-section 1, then provides that every person who is a settled ryot of a village within the meaning of section 20 shall have a right of occupancy in all land for the time being held by him as a ryot in that village. Consequently, a settled ryot may acquire a right of occupancy by occupation for a shorter period than twelve years, and, further, though every settled ryot is an occupancy ryot, every occupancy ryot is not necessarily a settled ryot; for, as was pointed out in Kuldip Singh v. Chhatur Singh (81), an occupancy right may be acquired by purchase, but the rights of a settled ryot can only be acquired by a continuous holding of land (not necessarily the same parcel of land) in the village for twelve years. It is manifest that the difficulty which was created by the language of section 6 of Act X of 1859 need not arise under the provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act.

Section 23 of the Bengal Tenancy Act authorises an occupancy ryot to use his land in any manner which does not materially impair the value of the land or render it unfit for the purposes of the tenancy; the section further entitles him to cut down trees, provided there is no local custom to the contrary. Sections 24 and 27 read together place the occupancy ryot in a position of distinct advantage so far as enhancement of rent is concerned; he is bound to pay rent only at fair and equitable rates, and, until the contrary is proved by the landlord, the rent actually paid must be deemed fair and equitable. Section 28 makes the rent enhanceable only as provided in the Act; section 29 invalidates agreements for enhancement beyond a prescribed limit, while sections 30 to 37 provide definite rules and restrictions when enhancement is claimed by suit. Section 25 affords protection from eviction, and this must be taken with section 89 which prohibits ejectment except in execution of a decree and section 155 which affords relief against forfeitures. Section 26 deals with the question of devolution of occupancy right on the death of the ryot and provides as follows:

"If a raiyat dies intestate in respect of a right of occupancy, it shall, subject to any custom to the contrary, descend in the same manner as other immoveable property; provided that in any case in which under the law of inheritance to which the raiyat is subject, his other property goes to the Crown, his right of occupancy shall be extinguished."

The right of occupancy, it will be observed, is, for the purpose of descent, thus placed on the same footing as "other immoveable property." This is hardly consistent with the theory that the right of occupancy is a merely personal right. This is further emphasised by the fact that the right of escheat is expressly negatived. Section 85 authorises subletting subject to specified restrictions, and section 87 allows the ryot to surrender his holding. Sections 76 and 77 entitle the ryot to effect substantial improvements including the construction of wells and tanks and the erection of a suitable dwelling house for himself and his family. Section 65, as already explained, protects the occupancy ryot from ejectment for non-payment of rent, makes the rent a first charge on the holding and entitles the landlord to bring it to sale in execution of a decree for arrears of rent thereof. Section 160 treats a right of occupancy as a protected interest, not liable to be annulled by a purchaser of the superior tenure at a sale in execution of a decree for arrears of rent. The cumulative effect of these and other provisions, which need not be enumerated in detail, is to furnish abundant indication that whatever might have been the law earlier, the occupancy ryot enjoys under the Bengal Tenancy Act substantial rights in the land and his interest cannot be appropriately described as a merely "personal right" or "personal privilege." The position then is that the status of the occupancy ryot is far more certain and secure under the Bengal Tenancy Act than it was ever before, and there is no good reason to hold that the provisions of the Act entitle him to object to the sale of the holding in execution at the instance of his creditor, if he was not competent to raise such objection when Act X of 1859 was in force or at an earlier period. Reference may in this connection be made to illustration (1) to section 183, which mentions a usage whereby a ryot is entitled to sell his holding without the consent of his landlord and affirms the validity of such usage as unaffected by the Act. This, no doubt, does not directly show that the landlord is the only person interested to question the validity of a transfer of his holding by a ryot; but it does not also lend any support to the theory that the tenant is competent to object to an execution sale of his holding even though his landlord should assent thereto. On these grounds we are of opinion that the decision in Bhiram Ali v. Gopi Kant (10) cannot be supported.

In this view, it is not necessary to examine in detail the subsequent decisions of this Court which have followed and developed in a modified form the rule enunciated in Bhiram-ali v. Gopi Kant (10), such as the cases of Durga Charan v. Ali Prasanna (31), Sadagar v. Krishna Chandra Nath (32), Majed Hossein v. Raghubar Chowdhry (33), Gahar Khalifa v. Kasimuddi (34), Sita Nath v. Atmaram (35), Sheikh Murullah v. Sheikh Burullah (36), Khodu Bakhsh v. Sader Pramanik (67), which specified the circumstances under which the ryot could impeach the validity of an execution sale even after it has taken place. We may note, however, that the current did not always flow in the same direction, as is indicated by the cases of Ananda Das v. Ratnakar (2), Shukuruddin Chowdhury v. Rani Hemangini Debi (3) and possibly also Dwarkanath v. Tarini Sankar (4). These cases uphold the doctrine that in principle there is no difference between the case of a voluntary sale made by the ryot and an involuntary sale held by the Court, if in each instance the sale is consented to by the landlord; consequently, a sale, in execution of a money decree, of an occupancy holding transferable by custom or local usage, is valid and effectual as against the ryot if the sale is held with the consent of the landlord.

We have finally to consider the decision of the Full Bench in Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy (6). It is not necessary to examine whether the Full Bench formulated any propositions not required for the decision of the actual questions involved in the cases then before the Court. An investigation of that point might have been necessary, if we had been bound by the decision of the Full Bench. We observe that the question of involuntary alienation was raised by the third reference; the point, however, is immaterial, because we as a Special Bench are free to consider the decision on its merits, and we shall do so on the assumption that all the propositions formulated were needed for the decision of the cases before the Full Bench. It will be observed that no reasons are assigned in support of the decision and the propositions enunciated represent the weight of modern authority alone. There is no indication that the attention of the Court was invited to the law, as it was understood and administered from the days of the Sudder Dewani Adawlut. No reference was made to the Construction of 1834, and although the decision in Baboo Prosonokoomar Tagore v. Ramohum Doss (17) was casually mentioned in argument, its true bearing does not appear to have been explained to the Court. Nor was the attention of the Court invited to the decision in Dwarka Nath Misser v. Hurrish Chunder (14), which affirms that there is, in principle, no ground for distinguishing in this class of cases a voluntary sale from a sale in execution. It seems as if the decision in Bhiram Ali v. Gopi Kant (10) was not subjected to a searching analysis and was adopted by the Full Bench without question. In these circumstances, we are unable to accept the decision of the Full Bench in Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy (6), in so far as it adopted the rule laid down in Bhiram Ali v. Gopi Kant (10) as developed with modifications in the later cases just mentioned. No useful purpose would be served by an examination of the cases subsequent to the decision of the Full Bench, which have, as required by the rules of Court, applied the propositions enunciated therein. Amongst such cases may be mentioned Badrunnessa Choudhrani v. Alam Gasi (38), Narayani v. Nabin Chandra (7), Ram Sundar Karmokar v. Lochan (39), Swarnomoyi v. Adu (40) and Bepin Chandra Barua v. Jagat Chandra Nath (41). These cases are based on the decision of the Full Bench and must stand or fall with it. Nor need we examine the position when an occupancy ryot effects a voluntary transfer of his holding for value by way of sale or mortgage, as in Bhagirath Changa v. Sheikh Hafizuddin (43), Ram Pershad Koeri v. Jawahir Roy (82) and Shyama Charan v. Mokhoda Sundari Debi (83), or makes a gift, as in Behari Lal v. Sindhubala (11), or makes a testamentary devise thereof, as in Amulya Ratan Sarkar v. Tarini Nath Dey (84), Kunja Lal Roy v. Umesh Chandra Roy (85) and Umesh Chandra Dutta v. Joy Nath Das (47). The decisions in cases of voluntary transfer for value were based on the application of what is described sometimes as the principle of estoppel, sometimes as the principle that the transferor is bound by his act or cannot derogate from his grant. On the other hand, the decisions in cases of involuntary sales, where the ryot with knowledge omitted or failed to object to the transfer, were based on the principle of acquiescence or waiver. There were manifest difficulties in the application of all such doctrines, because if the right of occupancy was a purely "personal right" or 'personal privilege,' it is not easy to appreciate how it could in fact be made transferable by invoking the aid of one or other of these principles of law; the transferee, even if accepted by the landlord, might only have a new tenancy as suggested in Tara Pershad v. Surjo Kant (21). Assuming, however, that it might thus acquire a character of transferability as between transferor and transferee, it would not afford protection as against third parties; yet barring possibly two cases, Agarjan Bibi v. Panaulla (5), and Basarat Mandal v. Sabulla Mandal (55), no trace can be found of a reported decision where the title of the transferee of a non-transferable occupancy holding has been successfully impeached by an absolute trespasser. But we need not investigate further the validity of the reasons which underlie the various reported cases. We are concerned in the present instance with the question of involuntary alienation alone; that, in our opinion, stands on the same footing as the question of voluntary alienation, the rule as regards which is too firmly settled to be successfully challenged.

Our conclusion is that the case of Bhiram Ali v. Gopi Kant (10) was erroneously decided and that the decision of the Full Bench in Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy (6) cannot be supported in so far as it affirmed the rule enunciated therein as modified and developed in later cases. The confusion which has pervaded the discussion of this question is attributable in a large measure to the ambiguity involved in the statement that "an occupancy holding is not transferable except by custom or local usage." This may imply one of three alternatives. In the first place, it may be maintained that an occupancy holding is absolutely inalienable by its nature. This view might possibly have been maintained towards the close of the eighteenth century but has apparently few, if any, champions at the present day. In the second place, the expression may signify that an occupancy right cannot be transferred unless both the landlord and the tenant consent. This was the view put forward for the first time in 1897 and has held the field upto the present time. There is, however, nothing to indicate that the Legislature ever intended to impose a disability on the occupancy ryot with a view to protect the helpless cultivator from rapacious money-lenders, as appears to have been the policy which actuated the framers of the Punjab Land Alienation Act, 1900. In the third place, the expression may signify that the transfer of an occupancy holding, whether voluntary or involuntary, cannot be made effective except with the consent of the landlord. This was the view maintained from 1834 to 1897. For reasons already assigned, we hold that the third view is correct and was, through oversight or error, negatived in 1897.

The result of our decision may be briefly summed up:—

CHANDRA BENODE v. ALA BUX.

(1). The case of Bhiram Ali v. Gopi Kant (10) was erroneously decided.

(2). The decision of the Full Bench in Dayomoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy (6) requires partial modification, namely, the following should be substituted for the first proposition enunciated therein regarding the transfer for value of occupancy holdings apart from custom or local usage.

"1. The transfer of the whole or a part is operative as against the ryot, whether it is made voluntarily or involuntarily."

When voluntary and involuntary transfers are thus placed in the same category so far as the ryot is concerned, no difficulty can arise under section 60 of the Civil Procedure Code, which makes saleable in execution all property belonging to the judgment-debtor over which he has a disposing power, thus prescribing precisely the same test as was formulated by Mr. Justice Jackson in Dwarka Nath Misser v. Hurrish Chunder (14), namely, that the measure of the liability to involuntary alienation is the power of voluntary alienation.

We have been finally pressed on behalf of the judgment-debtor to adhere to the rule enunciated in Bhiram Ali v. Gopi Kant (10), even though we should hold it erroneous in principle, as it was decided more than twenty years ago. Reliance has been placed in support of this contention upon the decisions of the House of Lords in The Mediana (86) and Kreglinger v. New Patagonia Meat and Cold Storage Co. (87). We are sensible of the importance of maintaining, wherever possible, the authority of long established decided cases; but this doctrine is manifestly not of universal application. Lord Cranworth observed as follows in Young v. Robertson (88):—

"There is another duty incumbent on all Courts, and pre-eminently upon a Court of ultimate appeal, and which has been invariably observed, namely, that as regards those rules which regulate the settlement and devolution of property, those Courts which have to interpret instruments and acts of parties must take care to be very guarded against letting any supposed notions as to the inaccuracy of any rule which has in fact been acted upon induce them to alter it so as to endanger the security of property and titles."

Lord Chelmsford considered the matter from the point of the duty of a Court of ultimate appeal when he observed as follows in Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Cameron (89):—

"The Courts rightly abstain from overruling cases which have been long established because, if they did so, they would only disturb without finally settling the law. But when an appeal from any of their judgments is made to this House, however they may be warranted by previous authorities, the very object of the appeal being to bring those authorities under review for final determination, the House cannot, upon the principle of stare decisis, refuse to examine the foundation upon which they rest."

Equally explicit is the pronouncement of Lord Loreburn in West Ham Union v. Edmonton Union (90):—

"Great importance is to be attached to old authorities, on the strength of which many transactions may have been adjusted and rights determined. But where they are plainly wrong, and especially where the subsequent course of judicial decisions had disclosed weakness in the reasoning on which they were based, and practical injustice in the consequences that must flow from them, I consider it is the duty of the House (of Lords) to overrule them, if it has not lost the right to do so by itself expressly affirming them."

The same principle has been followed in this Court and cases are not wholly unknown where Full Bench decisions have been overruled by Special Benches; see, for an instance, Jogodanund Singh v. Amrita Lal (91), which overruled the three Full Bench cases of Lal Mohun Mukerjee v. Jogendra Chunder Roy (92), Uzir Ali v. Ram Komal Shaha (93) and Girish Chandra Basu v.

Apurba Krishna Dass (94). The Judicial Committee have also not hesitated to overrule long standing decisions of Indian High Courts; Sri Balusu Gurulingaswami v. Sri Balusu Ramalakshmamma (95), Vasudeva Mudaliar v. Srinivasa Pillai (96).

In the present case there are, moreover, three special features which cannot entirely be overlooked. In the first place, the decision in Bhiram Ali v. Gopi Kant (10) departed from what had been the law for over sixty years. In the second place, the current of decisions since then has not been absolutely uniform. In the third place, we are called upon only to remove what has hitherto been erroneously regarded as a fetter upon the right of an execution creditor to realise his dues by the sale of an occupancy holding. The case, therefore, falls within the principle recognised by the Court of Appeal in Andrews v. Gas Meter Co. (97), by the Judicial Committe in Sri Balusu Gurulingaswami v. Sri Balusa Ramalakshmamma (95) and by the House of Lords in West Ham Union v. Edmonton Union (90) Our decision will not embarass trade or commerce, nor will it affect transactions which may have been adjusted, rights which may have been determined, titles which may have been obtained or personal status which may have been acquired. Decree holders will find that they possess a power which has hitherto been denied to them. No doubt, judgment-debtors like the respondent before us (who, as was found by the trial Court, can easily pay up the decree if he will, but is unwilling to pay it up) will no longer be able to escape payment of their just liabilities. That surely is a result which need not make us hesitate to lay down the law correctly.

We hold accordingly that the question before the Special Bench should be answered in the affirmative and that the sole landlord of a ryot is competent to sell, in execution of a money decree against the ryot, his occupancy holding, whether the holding be or be not transferable by custom or local usage. The appeal must accordingly be decreed and the application for execution allowed with costs in all the Courts, including costs of the hearing before the Division Bench and the Special Bench. The hearing fee is assessed at three gold mohurs on each occasion.

BOMBAY HIGH COURT.

LETTERS PATENT APPEAL No. 38 OF 1918.

January 20, 1920.

Present:—Sir Norman Macleod, KT., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Heaton.

JANARDAN SHANKAR AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—APPELLANTS

KRISHNAJI BALKRISHNA BHATE—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXIV, r. 6—Mortgage-decree, construction of—Property of mortgagor other than that mortgaged, whether can be sold.

A compromise decree passed in a mortgage suit directed the payment of the mortgage money by instalments and went on to provide: "In default of the payment of any two instalments, the plaintiff should recover the whole of the amount then due including all the future instalments by sale of the mortgaged property through Court":

Held, that the decree did not give any right to the decree-holder to proceed against any property of the judgment-debtor except the mortgaged property. [p. 380, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decision of Shah, J., in Second Appeal No. 967 of 1917, confirming the decree passed by the Additional First Class Subordinate Judge, A. P., at Sholapur, in Appeal No. 151 of 1916, confirming the order passed by the Subordinate Judge at Pandharpur, in Darkhast No. 17 of 1913.

FACTS appear from the following judgment of Shah, J., dated the 26th August 1918:—

"The decision of this appeal depends upon the construction of the decree under execution. The question is whether the plaintiff is entitled to execute the decree against the defendants. The defendants, who are the appellants, contend that he is bound to proceed against the property in suit and has no other remedy against them for the recovery of the decretal amount. The plaintiff-respondent contends that under the terms of the decree the defendants are bound to pay the money, that he is entitled to recover the amount by executing the decree, and that his right is not in any way limited by the provision in the decree that the amount should be realised by the sale of the mortgaged property. Though the Court of first instance had allowed execution in respect of the mortgaged property only at the outset, ultimately both the lower Courts interpreted the decree in favour of the plaintiff and allowed execution to proceed on that footing.

The decree in question is a consent decree. It was passed on the 23rd August 1910 in an ordinary suit, in which the plaintiff-mortgagee sought to realise the mortgage amount by the sale of the mortgaged property and in the event of a deficit to recover the balance from the defendants' other property. The material terms of the decree are these:—

"Defendants do pay to the plaintiff Rs. 2,754-9-2 as claimed, costs of the suit and interest on the principal sum of Rs. 2,400 from the date of the suit up to this day at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, whatever the sum may come to. The same should be paid in the following manner. Defendants should pay Rs. 300 each year to the plaintiff. The plaintiff should bring the same to account in the following way...In this way the defendants should pay the whole sum in instalments by paying Rs. 300 per year to the plaintiff as above until payment of the sum in full. The property in suit should remain in the possession of the defendants. Until payment of the whole mortgage amount the whole of the sum should be a charge on the mortgaged property. In default of the payment of any two instalments (the plaintiff) should recover the whole of the amount then due including all the future instalments by sale of the mortgaged property through Court...The whole of the sum due to the plaintiff should be paid up in instalments by paying Rs. 300 each year as above."

Taking the decree as a whole, I have no doubt that the defendants are required to pay the decretal amount in full in instalements and that the plaintiff has a right to recover the same. In case of default he is entitled to recover the whole amount by the sale of the mortgaged property. It is clear from the terms of the decree that the defendants were to pay the full amount in instalments. I see no reason to limit the plain meaning of the decree as to the payment of the full amount in instalments by the provision as to the realisation of the full amount by the sale of the mortgaged property in default of the payment of any two instalments. The decree directs the defendants to pay the full amount, and the obligation is not, in my opinion, limited by the provision relating to the sale of the mortgaged property.

If there had been an ordinary preliminary decree for sale under Order XXXIV, rule 4, and then a final decree under rule 5, the plaintiff would have got a decree for the balance under rule 6, if it was legally recoverable from the defendants. In a decree by consent I do not see any reason why the provision for the personal liability of the defendants as well as for the sale of the mortgaged property cannot be made in the manner in which it has been made in the present decree.

Mr. Murdeshwar has contended that the plaintiff should recover the whole amount by the sale of the mortgaged property in default of the payment of the two instalments, and that that is his only remedy. The decree does not say so in terms: on the contrary it gives directions more than once for the payment of the full amount in instalments.

Is is not necessary to refer to the cases cited in the argument before me. The question is one of construction of the decree, and it must be answered with reference to the terms of the decree.

It seems to be a possible construction of the decree that if the plaintiff seeks to recover the amonnt otherwise than by the sale of the mortgaged property, he can recover only the amount of the instalments which have become due, and not the full amount at once. This construction has not been suggested on behalf of the appellants before me, nor does it appear to have been urged in either of the lower Courts. I am not sure that the point necessarily arises for consideration in this appeal; and I do not express any opinion on the point. I decide the appeal, as it has been urged before me, as raising the question of the defendants' liability for the decretal amount with reference to their property other than the mortgaged property, and not the question of the extent of that liability in the present Darkhast.

Accordingly I confirm the decree of the lower Appellate Court, and dismiss the appeal with costs."

Mr. G. P. Murdeshwar, for the Appellants.

Mr. P. B. Shingne, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—A decree was passed on the 23rd August 1910 in a mortgage suit filed by the plaintiff, whereby it was directed that "the defendants should pay to the plaintiff Rs. 2,754 9 2 as claimed, costs of the suit, and interest on the principal sum of Rs. 2,400 from the date of the suit up to this day at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, whatever the sum might come to." The same was directed to be paid in the following manner:—

"Defendants should pay Rs. 300 each year to the plaintiff. Plaintiff should bring the same to account in the following way... In this way the defendants should pay the whole sum in instalments by paying Rs. 300 per year to the plaintiff as above until payment of the sum in full. The property in suit should remain in the possession of the defendants. Until payment of the whole mortgage amount the whole of the sum should be a charge on the mortgaged property. In default of the payment of any two instalments, the plaintiff should recover the whole of the amount then due including all the future instalments by sale of the mortgaged property through Court."

The defendants fell into arrears, and the plaintiff became entitled to execute. In his Darkhast he claimed to be entitled to execute not only by sale of the mortgaged property, but also by attaching other property belonging to the defendants. This claim was allowed by the lower Courts, and on appeal before Mr. Justice Shah the decisions of the lower Courts were confirmed. I fail to see how this decree differs in any respect from an ordinary mortgage-decree, which no doubt directs money to be paid by the mortgagor, but also directs that in default of payment in the prescribed manner, or within the prescribed period, the mortgaged property may be put up for sale. Then Order XXXIV, rule 6, says:

"Where the net proceeds of any such sale are found to be insufficient to pay the amount due to the plaintiff, if the balance is legally recoverable from the defendant otherwise than out of the property sold, the Court may pass a decree for such amount."

That contemplates that if the mortgaged property has been sold, and there is a deficiency, then the Court will proceed to consider whether the balance should be recovered personally from the mortgagor, and if it thinks it should then it passes a final decree personally against the mortgagor for the amount of the deficiency. Such a decree will be passed in the original suit, so that a fresh suit need not be filed. But it must follow that the question whether the mortgagee can recover the amount personally from the defendant, and not from the mortgaged property, is subject to entirely different considerations than those which guide the Courts in passing a decree for recovery of the amount charged on the property mortgaged. It seems clear to me that there must be a decree personally made against the mortgagor before it can be executed against property other than the mortgaged property. The decree in this case cannot be said to be a personal decree merely because it directs that the defendants should pay the amount. It directs specifically how the plaintiff shall recover the decretal amount if default is made in payment, and it says nothing about what shall happen supposing the mortgaged property, when sold, is insufficient to pay the mortgage debt. The plaintiff has endeavoured to avoid the difficulties, which may lie in his path if he followed the strict procedure, by proceeding in execution and asking that, if the mortgaged property when sold is insufficient, then some other property should be sold. In my opinion the mortgagee cannot follow that course. Therefore, with all due respect to the judgment of Mr. Justice Shah I think that the order of the trial Court cannot be supported, and that so far as it relates to property other than the mortgaged property, it must be set aside. The appellant will be entitled to his costs throughout.

HEATON, J.—I agree to the order proposed. After reading the decree which is now the subject of execution, it seems to me that it does not give any right to the decree-holder to proceed against any property of the judgment debtor, except that property on which the judgment-debt is made a charge. It certainly cannot be doubted that the decree does not expresely give the decree-holder any power to proceed against any other property, or against the judgment debtor personally. If such a result is to be arrived at, it can only be arrived at by implication. But again it seems to me on a very careful reading of the decree that the implication is not in that direction, but against it. It may be that if the mortgaged property when sold fails to discharge the mortgage-debt, there will still remain to the mortgagee a remedy for the recovery of so much of the debt as is not paid. It may be that he will be able, in order to recover that unpaid balance, to proceed against other property of the judgment-debtor. But that it seems to me will follow, if it does follow, from the general law relating to mortgagee and mortgagor, and not from the decree which has been made in this case. Indeed I myself should be inclined to say, that if any such result follows, it follows not on account of, but in spite of, the decree that has been made.

APPEAL FROM APPELLATE DECREE No 734 OF 1919.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 28, Sch. I, Art. 91—Applicability of Art. 91—Deed not intended to be operative—Adverse possession, acquisition of title by—Possession, suit for, whether maintainable.

Article 91 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act has no application to a case in which the document in question is merely fictitious and was not intended to be acted upon. [p. 382, col. 1.]

A person who has, by adverse possession, acquired an indefeasible title to property under section 28 of the Limitation Act, is entitled to maintain a suit for its possession if he subsequently loses it. [p. 383, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decision of the District Judge, Patna.

Messrs. Fakhruddin and Panchanan Banerji, for the Appellants.

Mr. Kulwant Sahay for Mr. S. C. Mitra and Mr. Bhagwan Prasad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit for a declaration of title and for recovery of possession of the lands described in the schedule to the plaint.

The defendants Nos. 4 to 10 are the appellants and they resist the claim of the plaintiff on the basis of a sale deed executed by her in their favour on the 13th July 1903. The deed in question is in the names of two of the appellants, Ram Birich Singh and Ramnugrah, defendants Nos. 4 and 5. The other defendants are members of the same family.

There was another sale deed executed on the same date in favour of defendant No. 1, Dwarka Singh. He did not contest the plaintiff's claim and so we are not concerned with him or his sale-deed. But it is important to know that the vendees, in both the deeds, Rambirich and Dwarka, are married to the daughters of the plaintiff's brother.

The plaintiff is the widow of one Rambhajju Singh, who died about 1891, and on his death she came into possession of the property in question as a Hindu widow. Her case was that at the time the deeds in question were executed she was harassed by her husband's agnates (gotias) and was in a very helpless condition and that the defendants Nos. 1 and 4, the vendees, as relations and well wishers were helping her at the time; that the sale-deeds were executed on the defendants representing to her that thereby the plaintiff would save her property from her agnates; that on their assurance she admitted the execution of the documents before the Registrar, but that they were neither read out to her nor did she understand the contents thereof or the effect of the same; that she continued to be in possession of the properties in spite of the execution of the deeds and in a suit instituted by the agnates against her and the purchaser defendants, the deeds were declared by the decision of the Court, dated the 24th February 1906, to be invalid, fraudulent, collusive and without consideration; that the defendants taking advantage of the deeds being in their names, fraudulently got their names recorded in the Survey Record of Rights and on the strength of that in Chaitra 1324 Fasli dispossessed the plaintiff of the lands in suit, and hence the present action for recovery of possession based upon the cause of action said to have arisen on the st of Asadh 1324 Fasli.

The defendants' pleas gave rise to the several issues framed by the Munsif. We are in this case concerned only with the issues relating to the validity or otherwise of the deeds in question, the adverse possession claimed by the defendants, and the limitation pleaded by them as a bar to the suit. All the issues have been decided by both the Courts below against the defendants and in favour of the plaintiff, with the result that her suit for possession has been decreed.

In appeal to this Court, Mr. Fakhruddin on behalf of the appellants disputes the correctness of the decision of the Court below on two points of law, (1) that the suit is barred by limitation both under Articles 91 and 144 of the Limitation Act, and (2) that the findings of the Court below are vitiated by wrongly throwing the onus upon the defendants. Mr. Fakhruddin has addressed to me a very lucid and learned argument and has taken me through all the cases bearing upon the points. After giving my full consideration to them I regret I am unable to agree with him on any of the aforesaid points urged by him.

Article 91 of the Limitation Act is sought to be applied to the suit on the ground that the plaintiff cannot obtain the relief claimed by her for the recovery of possession of the properties in dispute unless and until the sale-deeds executed by her were set aside. It is, however, conceded that the Article has no application to a case where the deed is inoperative from its inception. If the parties intended that the deed would not be ever given effect to, the real owner need not have it set aside.

The present case stands on the same footing. The lady's object in executing the sale-deeds was clearly to use the names of her relations as ostensible owners of the property and thereby to shield herself against the threatened attacks of her agnates upon her rights in the properties. She of course alleges in her plaint that she did not understand the documents and that they were not read out to her and that she did not know the contents thereof, and hence she charges the defendants with having the sale-deeds in question executed by her by fraud and undue influence. She knew fully that she was executing some documents benami in the name of her relations, but she was deceived as to the actual nature of those documents, and this distinguishes the present case from those relied upon by Mr. Fakhruddin, vide Janki Kunwar v. Ajit Singh (1), Jagadamba Chuodhrani v. Dakhina Mohun Roy Chaodhuri (2), Chunder Nath Bose v Ram Nidhi Pal (3), Sidhu Sahu v. Gopi Charan Das (4) and Anandappa v. Totappa (5).

In those cases the documents were given effect to and were subsequently sought to be set aside on the ground of fraud, undue influence and coercion, and hence Article 91 was applied. The real test is whether the documents in question in the present case were intended to be operative or not. If they were merely fictitious and were never intended to be acted upon, Article 91 would have no application. It is immaterial that in respect of the actual nature of the documents, whether they were to be sale deeds or some other kind of documents there was fraud practised by the vendees. The Court below has distinctly held that there was "no intention to convey the property." This finding is not and cannot be disputed and is a complete answer to the contention of the learned Vakil for the appellants.

This contention is also overruled by another finding that no consideration passed and the mention of it in the documents was simply fictitious. The documents being without consideration are void under section 25 of the Contract Act.

The third finding, that the lady continued to be in possession of the property in spite of having executed the documents, also makes Article 91 inapplicable to the present suit. Virtually the cause of action in the present suit is the dispossession of the lady from the properties which she was in possession of long after the execution of the deeds. The documents in question do not stand in her way to get the relief based upon her possession and dispossession. Article 144 of the Limitation Act will, therefore, apply.

The documents in question are set up by the defendants in support of their claim of title to the properties in suit and in this way the consideration of the documents is an incidental issue. I, therefore, hold that Article 91 has no application to the present case.

As to the suit being barred by 12 years' limitation, it is said that the Court below has not recorded a definite finding that the plaintiff was in possession within 12 years of the suit.

It is conceded that the Munsif, on a true and proper appreciation of the evidence in the case and in a well-reasoned judgment, came to a clear finding that the plaintiff was in possession throughout up to the Jaith or Asadh 1324 (1917). The learned Judge affirmed that decision and has clearly stated that there is no evidence that the possession was not with the plaintiff. The learned Judge must have, therefore, considered the evidence in recording the aforesaid finding. There is, therefore, no substance in this contention.

It is then said that the lady was a party to the fraudulent documents and that she put forward those documents in order to defeat the claim of the agnates in the previous litigation and that, therefore, she is not entitled to succeed in the present case.

No doubt her intention was fraudulent with a view to cheat the agnates of their claims to the properties in question, but the defendants contributed to the commission of the fraud and they cannot, therefore, take advantage of it. This has been made clear by the recent pronouncement of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Petherperumal Chetty v. Munandy Servai (6), and to my mind the principle enunciated in that case applies to the facts and circumstances of the present case. I took a similar view in the case of Badri Chaudhuri v. Harbans Jha (7), the facts of which case are not dissimilar to those of the present one. The first contention of Mr. Fakhruddin, therefore, fails.

There is no substance in ground No. 2 also. This ground is directed particularly to the finding of the Court below on the question of consideration. Both the Courts below have gone into that question and have referred to the evidence in the case, and notably to the inconsistent statements of the defendants regarding the passing of consideration made in the present case and those made in the previous litigation. As a result of the consideration of the evidence, the Courts below have clearly come to the conclusion that there was no passing of the consideration. I do not think that the question of onus is material, inasmuch as the evidence of the defendant has been fully considered. Even if the onus lay upon the plaintiff, she was examined in the case and upon her evidence the Courts below have held that she was a pardanashin lady, had no independent advice in the execution of the deed and that the deed was executed without consideration. There is, therefore, no error in the disposal of this question. This contention must, therefore, also fail.

But the defendants were not entitled to resist the claim of the plaintiff on another ground. The plaintiff has been found to be in possession from the date of the sale-deed up to Asadh 1324, that is, over 14 years, and she, therefore, acquired indefeasible title to the property under section 23 of the Limitation Act. So even if there was any defect in her title by reason of the deeds having been executed in favour of the defendants, she is entitled to succeed in the present action and to recover possession on the basis of the title acquired by her, subsequent to the execution of the sale-deeds, by adverse possession. The point has been discussed in great detail and also the authorities bearing on the subject in the case, already referred to, of Badri Chaudhuri v. Harbans Jha (7). I stick to that view and I hold that the plaintiff in this case upon that ground alone is entitled to succeed. This is answered by Mr. Fakhruddin by saying that the adverse possession was not pleaded as the basis of the plaintiff's title in the plaint, and that there was no issue upon the point. The facts necessary for adverse possession have been clearly stated in the plaint, showing that she has been in possession of the property without any interruption up to Asadh 1334 upwards of 12 years and upon that allegation the relief is claimed, that her title be declared. If the facts are proved, she is entitled to the declaration sought for by her. It was not necessary for her to state the legal phrase "adverse possession" when the necessary facts were stated by her. The issues raised in the case are wide enough to entitle the plaintiff to succeed on the ground of adverse possession, if that is made out upon the evidence in the case.

I, therefore, agree with the view taken by the Court below and dismiss the appeal with costs.

Under section 8 of the Transfer of Property Act the legal incidents of the transferor's interest, which pass on a transfer of property, include merely the rents and profits due after the transfer; the transferee is not entitled to profits prior to the transfer.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, South Kanara, in Appeal Suit No. 63 of 1918 (Appeal Suit No. 305 of 1917, on the file of the District Court), preferred against the decree of the Court of the District Munsif, Mangalore, in Original Suit No. 417 of 1915.

Mr. K. P. Lakshmana Rao, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—We agree with the findings of the lower Appellate Court except as to the profits which accrued before the assignment of 20th July 1915. Section 8 of the Transfer of Property Act provides that on a transfer of property, the legal incidents of the transferor's interest, which are to pass, shall include the rents and profits due after the transfer. In Kocharla Seetamma v. Pillala Venkataramanayya (1) it was held that a transfer of a claim to pass profits was invalid; and this is in accordance with English authority: Defrries v. Milne (2).

We must, therefore, allow the appeal, reduce the amount decreed by Rs. 62, and

Mortgage—Redemption—Clog on equity of redemption—Agreement subsequent to mortgage conveying portion of equity of redemption to mortgagee, validity of.

It is a principle of equity that a mortgagor can be relieved from any clog which has been placed on the equity of redemption. Therefore, if the original document of mortgage contains a clause that if the mortgage money is not repaid at the end of the mortgage period, the mortgagor should be foreclosed, that clause would not be specifically enforced against the mortgagor, and he would still be entitled in spite of it to redeem. But there is nothing to prevent the mortgagor and mortgagee from coming to an arrangement after the mortgage has been executed whereby the mortgage is paid off. [p. 384, col. 2; p 385, col. 1.]

Where a mortgage-deed provided that if after the lapse of twenty years the mortgage-debt should not be paid off, then half the mortgage property was to become the absolute property of the mortgagee, and the other half was to return to the mortgagor as his absolute property free from the mortgage, and considerably more than twenty years afterwards the parties entered into an agreement whereby half the property went to the mortgagee as owner and the other half was obtained by the mortgagor free from the mortgage:

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The plaintiffs filed this suit for accounts and redemption under the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act. The lower Appellate Court passed an order that the plaintiffs should redeem 7-12ths of the entire property as described in Exhibits 79 and 77 free of all encumbrances. The defendants-mortgagees have appealed with regard to certain property contained in the mortgage-deed of 1840 passed by the plaintiffs' ancestor. That mortgage was for a period of twenty years, and it was provided that if the money was not paid off at the end of twenty years, half the property should be taken by the mortgagor and half by the mortgagee. The mortgage money was not paid off at the end of twenty years, and the mortgagee remained in possession until 1864, when a document was passed by the mortgagor, which is Exhibit 76. That refers to the agreement in the mortgage of 1840, and effects a transfer of half the property to the mortgagee, and brings back into the ownership of the mortgagor the other half free of all encumbrances.

Now in this suit, which is filed in 1912, the plaintiffs wish us to hold that the arrangement which was arrived at in 1864 is not binding on them, and that they could redeem the property which was retained by the mortgagee under Exhibit 76. We have been referred to the decision in Kanhayalal v. Narhar (1). In that case the learned Judge referred to the case of Lisle v. Reeve (2) and no doubt the principle laid down in that case should be followed by a Court of Equity. It is a principle of equity that a mortgagor can be relieved from any clog which has been placed on the equity of redemption. Therefore, if the original document of mortgage contained a clause that if the mortgage money was not repaid at the end of the mortgage period, the mortgagor should be foreclosed, that clause would not be specifically enforced against the mortgagor, and he would still be entitled inspite of it to redeem. But there is nothing to prevent the mortgagor and mortgagee from coming to an arrangement after the mortgage has been executed whereby the mortgage is paid off Vaughan Williams, L. J., in the case I have cited said that "it was competent for a mortgagee to enter into an agreement to purchase from the mortgagor his equity of redemption. The only objection to such an agreement is, that it must not be part and parcel of the original loan or mortgage bargain...But there is nothing to prevent that being done by an agreement which in substance and in fact is subsequent to and independent of the original bargain."

Now it has been argued that this agreement, which was arrived at in 1864, was part and parcel of the original mortgage transaction effected in 1840, and in that argument of the respondent, we think, can be discerned the fallacy in the case and in the judgment in appeal. If at the end of the period in 1860 the mortgagor had failed to repay the mortgage, and the mortgagee had disputed the mortgagor's right to redeem, the Court would not have allowed that to be done. It would have been still open to the mortgagor to ask the Court to enable him to redeem. But if he chooses to enter into an agreement several years later with the mortgagee whereby the mortgage transaction is closed, whereby he gets back, free of his mortgage debt, half the mortgaged property, while the remaining half remains with the mortgagee, then I do not think any Court of Equity would allow the mortgagor to re open such a transaction. No doubt the terms of the agreement in 1864 and the deeds of sale in the transaction are identical with what was agreed to in 1840, and it is argued that on account of that it cannot be said that the agreement of 1864 is independent of the original bargain. I cannot agree with that argument. I cannot see any reason why the parties should not be allowed to come to the agreement, which, as a matter of fact, they did in 1864, as perfectly free agents. If the mortgagee sued for specific performance of the agreement of 1840, and asked for foreclosure, then that would have been an entirely different matter. It appears to me that this agreement in 1864 was not only subsequent, but also independent of the original bargain, and, therefore, in my opinion, this appeal succeeds, and the plaintiffs cannot redeem any portion of the property which was mortgaged in 1840 and transferred to the mortgagee in 1864 The case of Ramji v. Chinto (3), which was referred to in Kanhayalal v. Narhar (1), does not touch this point with which I have been dealing. That no doubt did give effect to the general principle of equity that "where an instrument of mortgage, though in terms it transfers an estate on failure to repay the mortgage money on a fixed day, yet appears clearly to have been entered into by parties for securing the repayment of a loan, the mortgagor, making the security subservient for the purpose for which it was created, may in equity and good conscience redeem the property by paying off the principal debt and the interest, though the stipulated time for payment had been allowed to pass by." No one disputes that, and the judgment I have delivered is no way contrary to the principle which is given effect to by that decision.

The only point argued in Appeal No. 242 of 1919 is whether the lower Appellate Court correctly interpreted Exhibit 80. It held that it could not be considered as an acknowledgment of the mortgage created in 1839 by Balaji Hari of his one-third share in eight annas by Exhibit 78. No doubt that document does refer to a certain share mortgaged with Karande by the plaintiffs. But we know that there had been a number of mortgages. It is imposible to hold that this is an acknowledgment of a particular mortgage passed in 1839, when there is no specific reference to that mortgage, and, therefore, Appeal No. 242 must be dismissed with costs. As defendants have succeeded throughout, they will get costs throughout in Appeal No. 22, which is allowed as to that part of the claim which was valued at Rs. 250.

HEATON, J.—The Judge in the Court below considered that he was bound by the decision in Kanhayalal v. Narhar (1). But a little consideration shows that that case is no authority whatever for the present. There was indeed a very similar mortgage-deed which provided very much the same as the present deed which we are concerned with here. The provision in the deed before us is that if after the lapse of twenty years the mortgage debt should not be paid off, then half the mortgaged property was to become the absolute property of the mortgagee and the other half was to return to the mortgagor as his absolute property free from the mortgage. In Kanhayalal's case (1) it was held, as I understand it, and also as I believe correctly, that the mortgage-deed would not automatically bring about the arrangement stated, at the end of the stated number of years. It would not do that, because the stipulation in the mortgage-deed would be regarded as a clog on the equity of redemption, and, therefore, as inoperative. In the case we are concerned with, however, the parties evidently did not suppose that the clause or stipulation in the mortgage deed would itself automatically effect its purpose because in 1864, i. e, twenty-four years, not twenty years, after the date of the mortgage, they accomplished what it had previously been arranged should be accomplished, in a proper and legal way by a registered document. There is only one possible ground on which, as far as I can see, that registered document can be declared to be of no effect, and on which it can be held that the Court must proceed exactly as if it had never been executed. It is this: that there is some legal objection to parties actually doing what they had undertaken to do, so long as they could not be compelled to do it. It is perfectly true that the mortgagor could not have been compelled to assent to what was done in 1864, even though the mortgagee had pointed out the provision in the mortgage bond. But there are thousands of lawful transactions entered into by people of their own free will, which they could not be compelled to enter into, and it seems to me to be no reason whatever against the validity of the transaction of 1864 that it was one which the mortgagor could not have been compelled to assent to. That, I think, is all that I need say in this case. It seems to me to be about as clear a case as one could have of a perfectly valid and honest transaction, and I think undoubtedly the trial Court was right, and that the Court of first appeal was misled by its belief that the matter was settled by the authority of Kanhayalal's case (1). I agree to the order proposed.

Appeal allowed.

Registration Act (III of 1877), ss. 32, 33, 61—Registration of power-of-attorney—Executant ill—Procedure—Execution before Registrar, whether necessary—Presentation—Courts, duty of.

It is the duty of the Courts in India not to allow the imperative provisions of the Registration Act to be defeated, when it is proved that an agent who presents a document for registration has not been duly authorised in the manner prescribed in the Act to present it. [p. 389, col. 1.]

When a person is ill and unable to attend at the proper registration office to present a power-of-attorney for registration, execution in the presence of the Registrar is not necessary; all the Registrar has to do in such a case is to satisfy himself that the power-of-attorney has been voluntarily executed. [p. 390, col. 1.]

Where a power-of-attorney was presented for registration by an unauthorised person, who stated that the executant was ill and deposited the fee for the Registrar to visit the executant or issue a commission for his examination to ascertain if the power-of-attorney had been voluntarily executed, and the Registrar visited the executant at his house, who admitted execution and requested that after registration the power-of-attorney be given to his attorney:

Appeal from the decree of the Allahabad High Court, dated the 5th March 1915, which reversed the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Bareilly.

BHARAT INDU v. MUHAMMAD HAMID ALI KHAN.

FACTS of the case are sufficiently set out in their Lordships' judgment. There were two points for decision, namely, (1) whether the mortgage upon which the plaintiff relied was duly registered as required by law, and (2) whether the mortgage in question was a sham transaction. The Subordinate Judge held that the mortgage was duly registered, but dismissed the suit on the ground that it was a bogus and paper transaction. On appeal the High Court (Tudball and Rafique, JJ.) held that the mortgage in suit was genuine and for consideration, and granted the usual mortgage decree.

Hence this appeal.

Mr. DeGruyther, K. C. (with him Mr. Dube), for the Appellants.—The mortgage in suit was not registered according to law. It was presented for registration by Daud Ali; his power-of-attorney authorised him to present documents, but this power was inoperative as it had not been presented for registration in accordance with law, and all the acts of the Registrar and the entire proceedings in respect of that document were without jurisdiction.

[LORD BUCKMASTER.—If Wilayat Ali had said "I present this document for registration and admit execution," you would have had no case.]

The document had already been presented to the Registrar who had acted on it.

[LORD BUCKMASTER.—Presentation, which is a formal matter, does not require formal words to effect it. Execution was admitted, and he said "give the document to Daud Ali when registered:" that means presenting for registration.]

If the document is handed over by an unauthorised person, the presentation is bad.

[LORD BUCKMASTER.—Presentation is a question of fact requiring no formality. The servant really wrongly handed over the document to the Registrar: he should merely have told him to go to the house.]

The Registrar took the presentation by the servant as good. It cannot be inferred that Wilayat Ali presented it a second time formally.

Mr. Dunne, K. C. (with him Mr. Kenworthy Brown), for first Respondent, was heard only on the question of fact, namely, as to whether the mortgage was a genuine one or not.

Mr. De Gruyther replied.

JUDGMENT.

LORD PHILLIMORE.—The suit which gave occasion to the present appeal was brought by the plaintiff, now the first respondent, as assignee of a mortgage executed on the 30th August 1895 by one Wilayat Ali Khan in favour of one Nazir Ali for Rs. 5,000 and interest. The assignment was made by deed of sale dated 24th January 1900 and the suit was brought to recover the sum due upon the mortgage or to obtain the sale of the mortgaged property.

There were several defendants; but those with whom their Lordships are concerned are the present appellants, heirs of one Babu Durga Prasad who had lent money to Wilayat Ali Khan upon mortgage of other properties, and had brought them to sale, and as the proceeds were insufficient to realise the sum due upon his mortgage, had obtained a further personal decree for the balance, and had thereunder attached the properties which were subject to the mortgage to the plaintiff in this suit. Ultimately these attached properties appear to have been brought to sale and then Durga Prasad or his heirs became the auction-purchasers. The title of these heirs is, therefore, subsequent to that of the plaintiff and their defence rests upon their ability to displace the mortgage upon which the plaintiff relies.

Two objections are taken on their behalf to the plaintiff's title. One is that the mortgage upon which the plaintiff relies was never duly registered. On this point both the Subordinate Judge and the High Court at Allahabad decided in favour of the plaintiff. The other point is that the mortgage in question was a sham transaction under which no money passed, executed by Wilayat Ali Khan to a nominal mortgagee in order that it might form a protection for that part of his estate against his other numerous creditors. Upon this point the learned Subordinate Judge decided in favour of the defendants and dismised the suit; but upon appeal the High Court thought otherwise and made a decree in favour of the plaintiff in the usual terms of a decree in a mortgage suit. Hence the present appeal.

Their Lordships will deal with the point as to registration first. By the Transfer of Property Act, section 59, where the principal to be secured exceeds Rs. 100, a "mortgage can be effected only by a registered instrument." The Indian Registration Act, then in force, Act III of 1877, is the Act governing the registration in this case. By section 32, except in certain cases not material to the present enquiry :—

"Every document to be registered under this Act, whether such registration be compulsory or optional, shall be presented at the proper registration office by some person executing or claiming under the same, or, in the case of a copy of a decree or order, claiming under the decree or order, or by the representative or assign of such person, or by the agent of such person, representative or assign, duly authorised by power-of-attorney executed and authenticated in manner hereinafter mentioned."

Now the mortgage in question was not presented by the mortgagee or the mortgagor, but by one Daud Ali, described as general attorney of Wilayat Ali Khan, under a general power of-attorney, dated the 1st and registered on the 4th November 1885. If, therefore, the registration is to be good it must be because Daud Ali was the agent of Wilayat Ali Khan, and was "duly authorised by power-of attorney executed and authenticated in manner hereinafter mentioned." Their Lordships have, therefore, to enquire whether the power of-attorney is sufficient within the meaning of this provision.

By section 33 :—

"For the purposes of section 32, the powers-of-attorney next hereinafter mentioned shall alone be recognised (that is to say) :—

"'(a) If the principal at the time of executing the power of attorney resides in any part of British India in which this Act is for the time being in force, a power-of-attorney executed before and authenticated by the Registrar or Sub Registrar within whose district or sub district the principal resides...'

"Provided that the following persons shall not be required to attend at any registration office or Court for the purpose of executing any such power-of attorney as is mentioned in clauses (a) and (b) of this section :—

"Persons who by reason of bodily infirmity are unable without risk or serious inconvenience so to attend...'

"In every such case the Registrar or Sub-Registrar or Magistrate (as the case may be), if satisfied that the power of attorney has been voluntarily executed by the person purporting to be the principal, may attest the same without requiring his personal attendance at the office or Court aforesaid.

"To obtain evidence as to the voluntary nature of the execution, the Registrar or Sub Registrar or Magistrate may either himself go to the house of the person purporting to be the principal ... or issue a commission for his examination."

Now the power-of-attorney, under which Daud Ali purported to act, was certainly executed by Wilayat Ali Khan and is sufficiently large in its terms to authorise Daud Ali to procure the registration of the mortgage in question. But it appears from the endorsement made by the Sub-Registrar, and must be taken to be the fact, that it was brought to him on the 4th November 1885 "for registration and authentication by one Wazir Beg, a servant of Wilayat Ali Khan, who said that the executant was ill and that he (the servant) was going to deposit the commission fee and asked that the power of-attorney might be registered on the spot." The Sub-Registrar could not legally do this, and accordingly on the 6th he personally went to the dwelling place of Wilayat Ali Khan, who he was satisfied was ill and unable without risk or serious inconvenience to attend at the registration office. He read out the contents of the power-of-attorney to Wilayat Ali Khan, who thereupon admitted the execution and completion of the power and asked that after registration the document might be given to Daud Ali. Thereupon the Sub-Registrar registered it. On these facts it is contended on behalf of the appellants that the power-of-attorney was not duly registered and, therefore, that Daud Ali had not the requisite authority to present the mortgage for registration, and that the mortgage has not been duly registered and is invalid.

The provisions of the Registration Act are very carefully designed to prevent forgeries and the procurement of conveyances or mortgages by fraud or undue influence, and though it may seem somewhat technical to insist upon exact compliance with the provisions of the Act, it is necessary so to do. Their Lordships have already given their sanction to the necessity of strict compliance with these forms in the case which was referred to at the Bar, Jambu Parshad v. Muhammad Nawab Aftab Ali Khan (1). In that case there were two mortgages presented at the registration office by two agents on behalf of the mortgagee, neither of whom held any authenticated power-of-attorney. Thereupon the Registrar, in pursuance of his duty under section 34, enquired of the mortgagors who were there present at the same time whether they admitted the execution of the deeds, and they said that they did. Whereupon the Registrar registered them. The presentation on behalf of the mortgagee being ineffective by reason of the defect in the powers of-attorney, an attempt was made to support it on the theory that the mortgagors who attended and admitted the execution and received the mortgage money might be assumed to have presented the mortgages. But the High Court at Allahabad and their Lordships on appeal held otherwise. Their Lordships observed that it was obvious that the mortgagors had attended to admit that they had executed the deeds and not to present them for registration and that they did not present them for registration. Their Lordships said that the mortgagors could not be treated as presenting them for registration; they were no doubt assenting to the registration, but that would not be sufficient to give the Registrar jurisdiction. They observed that one object of the Act was to make it difficult for persons to commit frauds by means of registration under the Act and that it is the duty of the Courts in India not to allow the imperative provisions of the Act to be defeated, when it is proved that an agent who presents a document for registration has not been duly authorised in the manner described in the Act to present it.

Their Lordships who are sitting on the present appeal have, therefore, to examine the evidence as to registration under the guidance of the decision just quoted.

Now it is said that the only presentation of the power of attorney was the presentation by the servant, Wazir Beg, who had insufficient authority and that the Sub Registrar accepted this presentation, and thereupon proceeded with the other steps required by the Act which follow on the presentation, and that the presentation was bad and that nothing that followed upon it could make it good. The Courts in India did not take this view, and their Lordships think that they acted rightly. It was probably an irregularity on the part of the Sub Registrar to accept the document as presented by Wazir Beg, and to enter, as he ultimately did, the registration as made on the 4th November instead of the 6th. But if all that had happened had been that Wazir Beg had come as a messenger with the document in his hand from his master, and requested the attendance of the Sub-Registrar at his master's house, because his master was ill, and if the Sub-Registrar, instead of letting Wazir Beg carry the document back, had carried it himself, and on reaching Wilayat Ali Khan's house had said to him, "Do you present this document? If so, do you admit its execution?" no objection could have been taken. Now it appears from the endorsement that the Sub Registrar, when he reached the house, read the power-of attorney through to Wilayat Ali Khan, who admitted the execution and completion of the instrument. The Sub Registrar went there because Wilayat Ali Khan desired it to be registered, and he knew from the message by the servant, and Wilayat Ali Khan knew that he knew, that Wilayat Ali Khan desired it to be registered and that he had been sent for and had come for the purpose of completing the registration.

The case is not like the one already quoted, because in the present case it is the person who desired to present and purported to present who took the further step and admitted the execution.

It is to be further observed that under section 61, the document after registration is to be returned to the person who presented the same for registration or to such person as he shall nominate. If Wazir Beg had been the person presenting, the document should have been returned to him, but the Sub-Registrar records that Wilayat Ali Khan asked that after registration the document might be given to Daud Ali—that is, he treated himself as the person who presented the document and who, therefore, had the power of saying to whom the document should be returned after registration.

(1) 28 Ind. Cas. 422; 42 I. A. 22; 19 C. W. N. 282; 13 A. L. J. 129. 17 M. L. T. 149; 21 C. L. J. 218; 2 L. W. 277; 37 A. 49; 28 M. L. J. 577; 17 Bom. L. R. 412; (1915) M. W. N. 592 (P. C.),

The proper conclusion from these facts was that drawn in the Courts below. The presentation by Wazir Beg was inoperative but not injurious to the validity of any subsequent presentation. It remains that Wilayat Ali Khan was the real presenter, and was so treated by the Sub-Registrar.

A further point was taken that section 33 requires that the document shall be executed before as well as authenticated by the Sub-Registrar, and that this power-of-attorney certainly was not executed in his presence. But all this is covered by the proviso already quoted, under which, if the person is ill, what the Sub-Registrar is to do is to satisfy himself that the power of-attorney has been voluntarily executed, for which purpose he may go to the sick man's house and examine him. This is what the Sub-Registrar did.

Upon the whole their Lordships are of opinion that this objection to the registration fails and that the appellants cannot succeed upon this ground.

There remains the question of substance upon which the Courts disagreed. It was urged on behalf of the appellants that the mortgage put in suit was a paper transaction; and that no money was really lent by Nazir Ali to Wilayat Ali Khan. The grounds for this contention are shortly as follows. That there is no documentary evidence outside the statement in the deed that any money passed upon the execution of the mortgage; that Daud Ali, who deposed to the fact that it did pass, says that a receipt was executed, and that this receipt is not produced; that there is again no documentary evidence except the sale-deed that Hamid Ali Khan, the plaintiff, paid anything upon the transfer when it was executed; that he was not called as a witness and produced no accounts; that he was the nephew of Wilayat Ali Khan; and that Wilayat Ali Khan, who died two years before the suit was instituted, was very heavily in debt, and might desire by this paper transaction to acquire a shield to protect his property from other creditors; that no interest appears to have been paid upon the mortgage; that it was put in suit very late; and that it is very doubtful whether Nazir Ali, who was a servant or Nazir in a native state and had a very small salary, could have had Rs. 5,000 to lend.

To this it was replied that it might well be that Nazir Ali, though his salary was small, acquired money in other ways: that there was nothing in the non payment of interest by the mortgagor, as he seems to have taken the same course with regard to other mortgages; that there was no delay in asserting the claim, the proper time to do so being when the auction-purchasers claimed the property; that the case which the appellants were now making was not their original case, which was that either Wilayat Ali Khan had never executed the deed, and that it was a forgery, or that Daud Ali had registered it after he had been dismissed and his power-of-attorney had been withdrawn; that in fact the case had been rather launched as one of fraud upon Wilayat Ali Khan than of fraud by Wilayat Ali Khan; that there was no reason for disbelieving the oral testimony; and lastly, that whereas Wilayat Ali Khan had effected considerable mortgages and failed to pay interest upon them, it was a mistake to suppose that he was insolvent, or had not in fact a considerable balance of assets, so that he would not be very likely to encumber his estates by a fictitious mortgage for the purpose of a protection which he did not need.

This last point led to the High Court remitting the case to the Court of the Subordinate Judge with a view to having it ascertained what Wilayat Ali Khan's real means at the time were, and the result was that the Subordinate Judge found that there was a very handsome balance of assets over liabilities. After this further finding, the High Court reversed the decision of the Subordinate Judge and held that the mortgage was a real transaction.

It has been urged before their Lordships that the matter largely turns upon the credibility or otherwise of the plaintiff's witnesses, Daud Ali and Nazir Hussain, who swore that the money passed, and that it is not right that the finding of the Subordinate Judge that these witnesses were to be disbelieved should be set aside by the High Court which did not see the witnesses; and in support of this contention reference was made to the decision of the Board in Bombay Cotton Manufacturing Company, Limited v. Motilal Shivlal (2). Their Lordships have no intention of entrenching upon the salutary principle laid down in that case. But in the present case the High Court had an important piece of knowledge which was not in the possession of the Subordinate Judge who tried the case. He proceeded upon the view, which was to a certain extent true, that Wilayat Ali Khan was "considerably involved," but he did not know that, however this might be, there was still an ample surplus of assets; and this important fact, of which the High Court was in possession, but of which the Subordinate Judge was not aware, might well warrant a different conclusion from that which was arrived at in the Court of first instance.

Upon the whole, though the case is not free from difficulty, their Lordships are of opinion that the High Court was right, that the transaction was not fictitious and that the decree made in the High Court should stand. Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

BOMBAY HIGH COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 617 OF 1918.

January 20, 1920.

Present:—Sir Norman Macleod, KT., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Heaton.

SHANKAR GOVIND JOSHI AND OTHERS —PLAINTIFFS—APPELLANTS

PARASHRAM JANARDAN GOKHALE— DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Bombay High Court Circulars, Rule 69 (vii), effect of —Execution of decree —Sale of property belonging to Hindu judgment-debtor—Share of sons, whether passes under sale.

Rule 69 (vii) of the Bombay High Court Circulars provides that if in the case of a Hindu judgment-debtor it is desired to sell the interest of any other member of the family (e. g., that of a minor son or brother), the name of such member and the fact that his interest is being sold must be stated in the proclamation, as otherwise his interest will not pass to the purchaser. [p. 392, col. 1.]

Where, therefore, in an execution sale a slip was added to the proclamation of sale that the interests of the sons of the judgment-debtor were not sold, but by mistake the sale certificate stated that the purchaser had purchased the entire property including the sons' interests:

Held, that the shares of the sons were not affected by the sale. [p. 392, cols. 1 & 2.]

Appeal from the decision of the first Class Subordinate Judge, A. P., at Ratnagiri, in Appeal No. 342 of 1916, reversing the decree passed by the Joint Subordinate Judge at Rajapur, in Civil Suit No. 274 of 1915.

Mr. V. O. Kelkar, for the Appellants.

Mr. P. B. Shingne, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—In this case the Court passed an order that the sale with regard to the mortgaged property should proceed in respect of eight-annas share of defendant No. 1. That was the share of Govind, the father of the present plaintiffs. Apparently no one knew of the existence of the plaintiffs at that time. They were not made parties to the proceedings. Under that order the property was put up for sale by auction. As nobody bid over Rs. 1,000, the present defendant bought the eight-annas share for Rs. 1,005. The defendant then filed a suit for partition against the holder of the other eight-annas share and got a decree in 1911. The plaintiffs, who are the sons of Govind, then came forward and said that they were not parties to the decree and Darkhast, and that the Court sale only affected their father's share which was two annas, and that, therefore, their share of annas six remained unaffected.

We have to consider then what was sold by the Court under the order made on the 22nd October 1908. No doubt the Court directed that the eight-annas share of defendant No. 1 in that suit should be sold. Then the proclamation of sale was drawn up in accordance with the High Court Circulars. At page 97, Rule 69 (vii) lays down in what form the proclamation of sale should be prepared. That states: "If in the case of a Hindu judgment-debtor it is desired to sell the interest of any other member of the family (e. g., that of a minor son or brother), the name of such member and the fact that his interest is being sold must be stated in the proclamation, as otherwise his interest will not pass to the purchaser." A slip was added to the proclamation of the sale that the interests of the sons of the judgment debtor were not sold If it had not been for that slip, no doubt under the ruling of the Privy Council in Shripat Singh v. Maharaja Sir Prolyot Kumar Tagore (1) the sale of the right, title and interest of Govind would have included other interests which the judgment-debtor himself might have sold. But when it is expressly stated in the proclamation that the interests of the sons are not sold, and it turns out afterwards that there are sons, then it is impossible to see how it can be argued that the auction-purchaser had purchased the interests of the sons. It makes no difference if by some mistake a certificate is given to him that he has purchased the eight-annas share of Govind. In this case the defendant himself was the purchaser, and it was his business to look at the proclamation of sale, and see exactly what was being sold. We have been asked to look at other facts in the case, namely, the order of the Court and the certificate. But, however much we look at those other facts, we still have this plain fact that the interests of the sons were not sold. If they were not sold, they could not have been bought. It may be that all the equities in the case may be with the defendant. But he has only himself to blame, if he has been so careless at the time of the auction as not to see exactly what was being put up for sale. The learned Judge seems to think that it was not the business of the defendant to exercise any such precautions, and that if he purchased without dreaming that the Karkun would add such a slip, as was added, against the orders of the Court, still he must be taken as having bought what as a matter of fact was not put up for sale. It is necessary in Court sales that everything should proceed according to order, and once we depart from the rules, and find, as we are asked to do in this case, that a man has bought what was not put up for sale, there is no knowing what arguments may be presented to us in other cases, with the result that there will be no regularity and no proper order in conducting these Court sales. In my opinion, therefore, the decree of the lower Appellate Court must be set aside, and the plaintiffs must succeed. The decree of the trial Court should be restored with costs throughout.

HEATON, J.—Many years ago it was recognised that the laxity and confusion in connection with the Court sales of joint family property of Hindus amounted to an evil which it was necessary to correct. Joint family property was loosely and imperfectly described, and it was constantly maintained that the interest therein of members whose existence had been totally ignored during the progress of the suit had been sold at Court sales. It was in order to introduce some precision and care in these matters that the High Court laid down Rule 69 (vii) of the Manual of High Court Circulars at page 97, which has been referred to by my Lord the Chief Justice. This rule called general attention to the circumstance that if in the case of a Hindu judgment debtor it was desired to sell the interest of other members of the family, the names of those members should be stated. We have here a typical case. A mortgagee brought a suit and obtained a decree, and under that decree the eight-annas share of defendant No. 1 in the suit was ordered to be sold, and property described as his eight-annas share in the proclamation was sold. As a matter of fact he had three sons. But during the progress of the suit no mention was made of them, and the property was described roughly in the proclamation as the eight-annas share of this defendant No. 1. But in the proclamation of sale there appeared, in accordance with the very careful directions that this Court had given, a notice that "no interest of any son, brother or other co-parcener of the said judgment-debtor shall pass unless hereinbefore by name expressly specified for sale." What was actually announced for sale, therefore, was the interest of defendant No. 1, and the interest of other members of the family was excluded. It seems to me, after hearing this case, that it is futile now to urge that what was sold at that sale was the entire eight annas share. To do so would be to ignore the express provision in the proclamation of sale. It would also be to effect that very evil which the careful orders of this Court were promulgated in order to prevent. I confess I am rather astonished to find the Court of first appeal apparently taking the view that the Karkun who pasted on the proclamation this condition that no interest of any son, brother, etc., should pass, had done so against the order of the Court. There is nothing on the record, so far as I can see, to justify such a statement. On the other hand, there are express and definite rules of this Court, and it may be presumed, and I think safely presumed, that this condition was introduced, not by the whim of the Karkun, or against the orders of the Court, but in order to give effect to the directions of the High Court. I think, therefore, the appeal must be allowed with costs throughout.

Appeal from a decree of the District Judge, Durbhanga.

Mr. L. N. Singh, for the Appellant.

Mr. Saroshi Chandra Mitter, for Mr. C. S. Banerji, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

COUTTS, J.—This appeal arises out of an objection made in an execution proceeding that the application for execution is barred by limitation. The original decree was passed on the 23rd of March 1906 and this application for execution was filed on the 21st of May 1918. This being more than 12 years from the date of the decree, ordinarily the application would be barred under section 48 of the Code of Civil Procedure and an objection to this effect was made by the judgment-debtor. The decree-holder, however, has sought to save limitation by reason of an order dated the 27th of July 1912. It appears that several applications for execution were made and it was in the course of one of these that the order referred to was passed. The order runs as follows:—

"The decree-holders and judgment-debtor Mathura Prasad filed a petition of adjustment on the 10th July last. I sanction the adjustment. It is ordered and decreed that the claim is adjusted at Rs. 2,325 and that the debtor having paid Rs. 700, the balance of Rs. 1,625 shall be paid as follows.

"Within 30th Kartick 1320 (1913) Rs. 400, within 30th Baisakh 1320 Rs. 500, within 30th Kartick 1321 (1914) Rs. 500 and 30th and 30th Chait 1321 Rs. 225 each with interest at 6 per cent. per year from the date of the adjustment on 10th July last till re payment, in default of any one instalment the compound kists shall become at once payable; let this be noted in the register of suit. Part satisfied and dismissed."

The learned Subordinate Judge, holding that this order is substantially an order under Order XX, rule 11, has allowed the execution to proceed. On appeal to the District Judge the order has been set aside, the learned District Judge holding that the order of the 27th July 1912 is not an order under Order XX, rule 11, inasmuch as it was passed by the Executing Court and not by the Court which passed the decree. He also held that even if it were an order passed under Order XX, rule 11, the application for payment of the amount of the decree by instalments was barred under Article 175 of the Limitation Act, and consequently the order on this application will not save the application to execute the decree from being time-barred. The learned District Judge's view appears to be correct. Order XX, rule 11, clearly refers, in my opinion, to an order passed by the Court which passed the decree, and this was also the view taken in the case of Jurawan v. Mahabir Dube (1) in which the learned Judges remarked: "After consideration we have come to the conclusion that subsequent order directing payment in section 48, clause (b), means a subsequent order made by the Court which made the decree acting as that Court and not an order of a Court executing a decree." Even, however, if the order were one under Order XX, rule 11, the result would be the same, for the application was clearly barred under Article 175 of the Limitation Act. The order of the Executing Court, therefore, was without jurisdiction and it cannot save an application to execute the decree from being barred by limitation.

We have been referred by the learned Vakil for the appellant to the case of Jhoti Sahu v. Bhubun Gir (2), but this decision was in terms held to be wrong in the case of Abdul Rahaman Sodagur v. Dullaram Marwari (3), and in this latter case it was held that an application to pay by instalments being barred, the Court had no power to pass an order for payment by instalments and the order did not operate to extend the pericd of limitation for execution of the decree.

In my view then the order of the learned District Judge is correct and I would dismiss this appeal with costs.

ADAMI, J.—I agree.

In order to prove that there was interference with the rights of an adopted son within the meaning of Article 119 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act, it must be established that something was done which was incompatible with the recognition of the adoption. [p. 395, col. 1; p. 396, col 1.]

The mere fact that a person shares an erroneous belief with other persons does not give rise to estoppel. [p. 396, col. 2.]

More than six years but less than twelve years after the death of S his widow brought a suit to recover the estate left by S on the ground that V was not entitled to succeed to it:

Held, (1) that V's succeeding to the estate of S could not be said to be an interference with the rights of S within the meaning of Article 119 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act and that, therefore, the suit was not governed by that Article; [p. 395, col. 1; p. 396, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C J.—The plaintiff sued to recover possession of the plaint property as the widow of one Shambhudixit, who was adopted in 1878 by a family of the name of Athavale. The defendants are the grandsons of Shambhu by their father Vishwanath, who was born in 1877 before the adoption. Therefore according to Hindu law Vishwanath, the son of Shambhu, after Shambhu's adoption into the Athavale family, remained in his father's old Joglekar family. Shambhu died in 1904.

The defendants oppose the plaintiff's claim mainly on two grounds, one of limitation, the other of estoppel. It was contended that Article 119 applied, and that although the suit was one to recover possession of the property, the plaintiff, before she could succeed, had to obtain a declaration that her husband's adoption was valid. Therefore, she was bound to bring the suit within six years after the rights of Shambhu, the adopted son as such, had been interfered with. The learned Judge found that such interference took place when Vishwanath was entered as the owner of the Athavale estate in the Record of Rights in 1904. Assuming that the plaintiff is bound to obtain a declaration that Shambhu's adoption was valid, we do not think that after his death there could be any circumstances which would amount to an interference with the rights of Shambhu as such adopted son. The facts in Gangabai v. Tarabai (1) are somewhat similar. It seems the learned Judges were of opinion that in that case until the death of the adopted son it was not suggested that his right as such adopted son had ever been interfered with, and they came to the conclusion that Article 119 did not apply to the facts of that case. Although the point we have had to decide may not have been actually decided in that case, we certainly think that Article 119 cannot be applied to the facts of this case, so that the plaintiff, the widow, would have twelve years within which to bring her suit, and admittedly in that case the suit is within time.

The second point on which the defendants succeeded in the lower Court was one of estoppel. It appears that after Shambhu's death Vishwanath and then the defendants were in possession of the property, and in 1913 the plaintiff gave to Vishwanath's widow Umabai a receipt whereby she declared: "According to agreement, whereby I am to receive Rs. 70 for my maintenance, I have this day received in all Rs. 33 for the year 1835 Pramadi. The balance to be paid by you is Rs. 36." No doubt at that time it appears that the plaintiff thought that she was only entitled to maintenance. It is suggested that she thereby induced the defendants to give up any rights that they might have had to the Joglekar property by representing that they were entitled to succeed to the Athavale property on the death of Shambhudixit. There is no evidence whatever, even assuming that the plaintiff had induced them to believe that she had no claim to Shambhu's property, that they acted on such a belief. There is no evidence that there was any Joglekar property, or, if there were, that they made any claim to it, and gave up any rights they had in it, because that they thought that owing to representation made by the plaintiff they were entitled to Shambhu's property. In the absence of that evidence we do not see how in any event there could be an estoppel. But apart from that there was in this case at the best a mistake on the part of the plaintiff, and also of the defendants, with regard to the rights which the Hindu Law gave her over her husband's property in the circumstances of the case.

In my opinion, therefore, the decision of the learned Judge on issues Nos. 7 and 8 was wrong, the appeal succeeds and the plaintiff is entitled to the decree which she asked for in her plaint with costs in both the Courts.

Usual order as to costs in the case of a successful pauper appellant.

HEATON, J.—There is no doubt that Shambhu was the adopted son of Krishnadixit. That is found as a fact by the lower Court and has not been contested before us. Shambhu as such adopted son succeeded to the property of the Athavale family. He died in 1904. His own son Vishwanath was born before Shambhu's adoption, so that for the purposes of inheritance Vishwanath ceased to be the son of Shambhu after the latter's adoption. He remained a member of his own natural family, the Joglekar family, and never became a member of the Althavale family. Therefore on Shambu's death, so far as the facts proved tell us, the successor to the Athavale property was the plaintiff, the widow of Shambhu. It happened, however, that the property actually passed to Vishwanath and his sons, and the plaintiff, the widow only received maintenance. She signed receipts for this maintenance and accepted the position that I have described.

(1) 26 B. 720; 4 Bom. L. R. 516.

The plaintiff, so far as her title is concerned, has made good her case, and she is entitled to succeed except for two possible objections, one of limitation and the other of estoppel, which the Court below held to be good objections.

The objection of limitation is based on Article 119 of the Schedule. It is said that seeing that after Shambhu's death in 1904 a Joglekar succeeded to the property, there was an interference with the rights of Shambhu as an adopted son. Now we have been asked to treat the words "rights of the adopted son as such" as meaning the rights of the adopted son during his lifetime. If that is the correct reading, then certainly Article 119 cannot apply here, because there was no interference with Shambhu's rights as an adopted son so long as he was alive. The interference, if any, came after he died. But setting aside that possibly correct but certainly narrow interpretation of the words, and taking them in their wider sense, I still think the plea of limitation is not made out. If the words be taken in their wider sense, still there must be something done which is incompatible with the recognition of the adoption, otherwise there cannot be any interference with the rights of the adopted son. Now what was done here was in no sense whatever a refusal to recognize the fact that Shambhu was the adopted son. What was done was based on the acceptance of that fact. It was only because Shambhu was adopted into the Athavale family that Vishwanath, his natural son, could possibly have been allowed to take the Athavale property on Shambhu's death. Therefore, there was no interference with the rights of the adopted son but an actual recognition of those rights, and I think that Article 119 cannot be said to have any application here. The true reason why Vishwanath was allowed to take the property was that everybody concerned misunderstood the law. They thought—I am bound to say I am not the least surprised—that seeing that Vishwanath was the natural son of Shambhu, he would succeed to his natural father's estate when his father died. But unhappily for Vishwanath, that is not so. When you have an adoption of a man who has a son alive, the man passes into the family of his adoption, the son remains in his natural family. And seeing that this is the true legal state of affairs here, it seems to me to be opposed also to the point of estoppel. It is perfectly true that the widow, the plaintiff, accepted the position that Vishwanath was to succeed to the property, but in so doing she merely shared in common with the other members of the family an erroneous belief. The sharing with others of an erroneous belief is not a circumstance from which it can be said that the widow caused or permitted another person to believe that to be true. There was no causing and no permitting in the sense in which those words are used in section 115 of the Indian Evidence Act. They shared a mistaken belief in common. And if responsibility for such a mistaken belief is to be attributed to any one, it certainly ought not to be attributed to the widow.

I agree with the order proposed by my Lord the Chief Justice.

HURNUNDROY FULCHAND—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Sale of goods—Due date of performance falling on Sunday—Trade usage entitling performance of contract on the day following, whether can be proved.

In the absence of statutory provision or trade custom or usage to that effect, the fact that the performance of a contract falls due on a holiday does not alter the rights of the parties by suspending the transaction of private business. [p. 401, col 1.]

Mercantile usage, though it needs not either the antiquity, the uniformity or the notoriety of custom for its enforcement, must be so well known and acquiesced in that it may be reasonably presumed to have been an ingredient tacitly imported by the parties into their contract. [p 402, col. 1.]

The usage of which evidence is received must not be repugnant to or inconsistent with the written contract. [p. 402, col 2.]

But in order that the material incident which it is sought to annex should fall within the exception of repugnancy, the incident must be such as, if expressed in the written contract, would make it insensible or inconsistent or thoroughly unreasonable. [p. 402, cols. 1 & 2.]

If the due date of performing a written contract falls on a Sunday, the party to the contract who alleges the existence of a trade usage under which he is entitled to perform the contract on the day following the Sunday, must not only prove the existence of the trade usage but also establish that the usage, when read into the written contract, does not make it insensible or inconsistent. [p 403, col. 1.]

Appeal against the following decision of Mr. Justice Bucklard, dated the 2nd December 1919:—

"This is a suit for damages for breach of a contract dated Sraban Sudi 3rd, 1975, corresponding to the 9th August 1918, whereby the plaintiff firm sold to the defendant firm 45 bales of grey shirtings in lots of 15 bales each of three descriptions, namely, B5, No. 454 and Mahadeo and Company's goods, at Rs 26 8 0 per bale for delivery 90 days from the 29th July, that is the 27th October 1918. This latter date was a Sunday, in consequence of which I cannot say this action has resulted but the contest has assumed a particular form. The breach charged is the failure to take delivery of and pay for the goods.

The plaintiff firm are the Banians of the Bombay Company, Limited, and towards the beginning of the trial a question was raised as to their having the goods on the due date. Upon proof from the books of the Bombay Company that the plaintiff firm had effected a purchase of these goods on the 5th August and that certain specific bales had been appropriated to this contract and that those bales were re-sold against the defendant firm on the 2nd November, that point was abandoned. The plaintiff firm in their plaint say that there is a well known usage in connection with European importing firms that if the due date falls on a Sunday or a public holiday, the same is excluded and the following day is taken as the due date. To this the defendant firm reply denying the usage and saying that in transactions with European importing firms, if the due date falls on a Sunday, delivery is taken and given on the previous Saturday, and not on the following Monday, and that in transactions between Indian merchants, the due date is adhered to irrespective of whether it is a Sunday or a working day and delivery is taken and given on a Sunday, if that be the due date under the contract.

The plaintiff firm offered on the 28th October to give delivery of and called upon the defendant to pay for the goods, while the defendant alleges that he went with his Gomasta Ram Chundra on Sunday the 27th October and demanded delivery and offered to pay for them. This Mulchand, the plaintiff firm's Gomasta, denies. With regard to this matter two things are quite clear. Mulchand undoubtedly thought that Monday would be the due date and on that date the market was against the defendant. There is also the correspondence to be considered in this connection. The first letter is that from the plaintiff firm to the defendant, in which the date has obviously been altered to the 29th October. It is inconceivable that had the defendant gone and tendered the money as he says he did, the plaintiff firm would not have made some reference to the fact in that letter. As regards the alteration in the date the press copy letter-book clearly shows that the date must have been the 28th. It seems to me that it is very probable that the defendant altered the date in order to make it appear that the letter was despatched after his own of the 28th, which was written with the idea of getting his own story on record first. There is no reason why the plaintiff firm should alter the date after the letter had been press-copied, as it would be fatal to any case that they could make since no one suggests that the 29th was the due date. Once the defendant's letter of the 28th was received, there was an immediate denial by the plaintiff firm through their Solicitors of the defendant's story, and at the same time a full exposition of their own case. In view of these circumstances I have no hesitation in accepting the plaintiff firm's denial in preference to the defendant's story and I find as a fact that the demand for delivery and tender of the price on the 27th October did not take place.

The next question is whether the plaintiff was right in treating Monday the 28th as the due date for delivery. This depends on custom, and among other witnesses Mulchand, the plaintiff's Gomasta, has given evidence in regard to it. He says that where the due date falls on a Sunday in respect of goods which have been purchased from an European firm, such as the Bombay Company, and sold to an Indian dealer, the due date for delivery would be Monday. With reference to transactions between Marwaries, he says that transactions are entered into on a Sunday and they give and take delivery on Sunday according to the custom that prevails even when there is no European importing firm concerned in the matter, if the goods are required. In his cross-examination it appears that he relied on the words "bhar ke majub," which I understand him to regard as importing the custom upon which he relies into the contract. The evidence of Mr. Morgan of the Bombay Company, of Mr. Barker of Messrs. Graham and Company, and of Mr. Zellichi of Messrs. Ralli Brothers supports the plaintiff firm's case. These witnesses, it is true, were unable to give specific instances of deliveries on Monday, when the due date fell on Sunday, but they are not personally concerned with actual deliveries. With regard to Indian merchants Mr. Zellichi of Messrs. Ralli Brothers said that they recognise that custom, and he further said that if they wanted delivery of goods on a Sunday or holiday they would have to advise his firm beforehand and in that case the office was opened and they would give delivery. Luchminarain also supported the plaintiff, but he qualified his answer as regards contracts between Indian merchants. He said "if the goods which form the subject-matter of the contract are goods purchased from an European importing firm, then this custom applies but if the goods which form the subject-matter of the contract between two Marwaries have no reference to the European importer's firm, that is another question." Delivery in such a case according to him must follow whatever the terms are under which the contract was made. The witness Lunkaran gave evidence to the same effect with regard to custom and said that in such a case Monday is the due date. With regard to contracts between Marwaries, his evidence is that where there is a contract between Marwaries the buyer would not get the goods on Sunday because if the goods were lying in the importer's godown, they would not be able to give delivery on that date since the man who was to give delivery could not get it. He also said that it is at the option of the seller to give delivery on that day or Monday. Phani Bhusan Mitra was called primarily on another point and his evidence, though supporting the plaintiff firm as regards custom, does not carry the matter any further.

On behalf of the defendant firm, the defendant himself gave evidence and I am not prepared to place any reliance on his evidence on this point, seeing that I do not accept his statement as to what occurred on the 27th October. Mr. Lacey says that in his estimation delivery should be given on the previous Saturday. It is true that he says that he never heard of this custom, but he does not deny its existence. His last answer in which he says that the evidence that he has given with regard to this custom is based not on what he had heard but on what he himself thinks it should be, rather detracts from the value of his evidence. Mr. Fildes and Mr. Oldfield both say that where the due date falls on a Sunday, delivery according to the rules of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce is given on the previous Saturday. They apparently know nothing about any such custom. This may be as a result of their being guided by a different rule. I should observe that when I admitted the rule of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce in evidence, I did so merely as showing what the rule is by which these witnesses are guided, and it has not been proved as having been made by the Chamber of Commerce so as to have the force and effect which a rule of that body undoubtedly would have in a matter of this kind. Megraj, both witnesses of this name, proved the fact of deliveries being made on Sunday, and Chogunlal did the same and in one instance by the Bombay Company. They also said that when the due date falls on a Sunday Indian merchants give and take delivery on that day. I do not attach great value to the evidence of actual deliveries being given and taken on Sunday, because the instances are comparatively few and there is nothing to show the actual circumstances or the due date. The goods may have been for shipment, they may have been delivered before the due date, by reason of the due date and intervening period being holidays and without such and similar information it is not possible to extract from the bare fact anything establishing a rule of conduct. It is, however, quite clear from the evidence that except in special cases European importing firms do not deliver on a Sunday, and this circumstance has its effect upon dealings between Marwaries when the goods to be delivered are in the importer's godown. The conclusion I have arrived at is that where imported goods to be delivered from the godown of the importing firm are concerned, and where the due date falls on a Sunday or on a holiday, the custom is to give delivery on the following working day. As between Marwaries where such first mentioned condition does not exist, the custom is to give and take delivery on the due date even if the due date falls on a Sunday or a holiday.
